Wefald hires new recruiters

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Although the University has the smallest admissions staff in the Big Eight, the addition of nine new recruiters has improved this situation, said President Jon Wefald, originator of the new recruiting program.

"In comparison, Colorado University has around 48 people in its admissions department. K-State had 14, which has now been increased to 23," he said.

"Although we are still at the bottom of the Big Eight, we need to have that kind of presence in numbers," Wefald said.

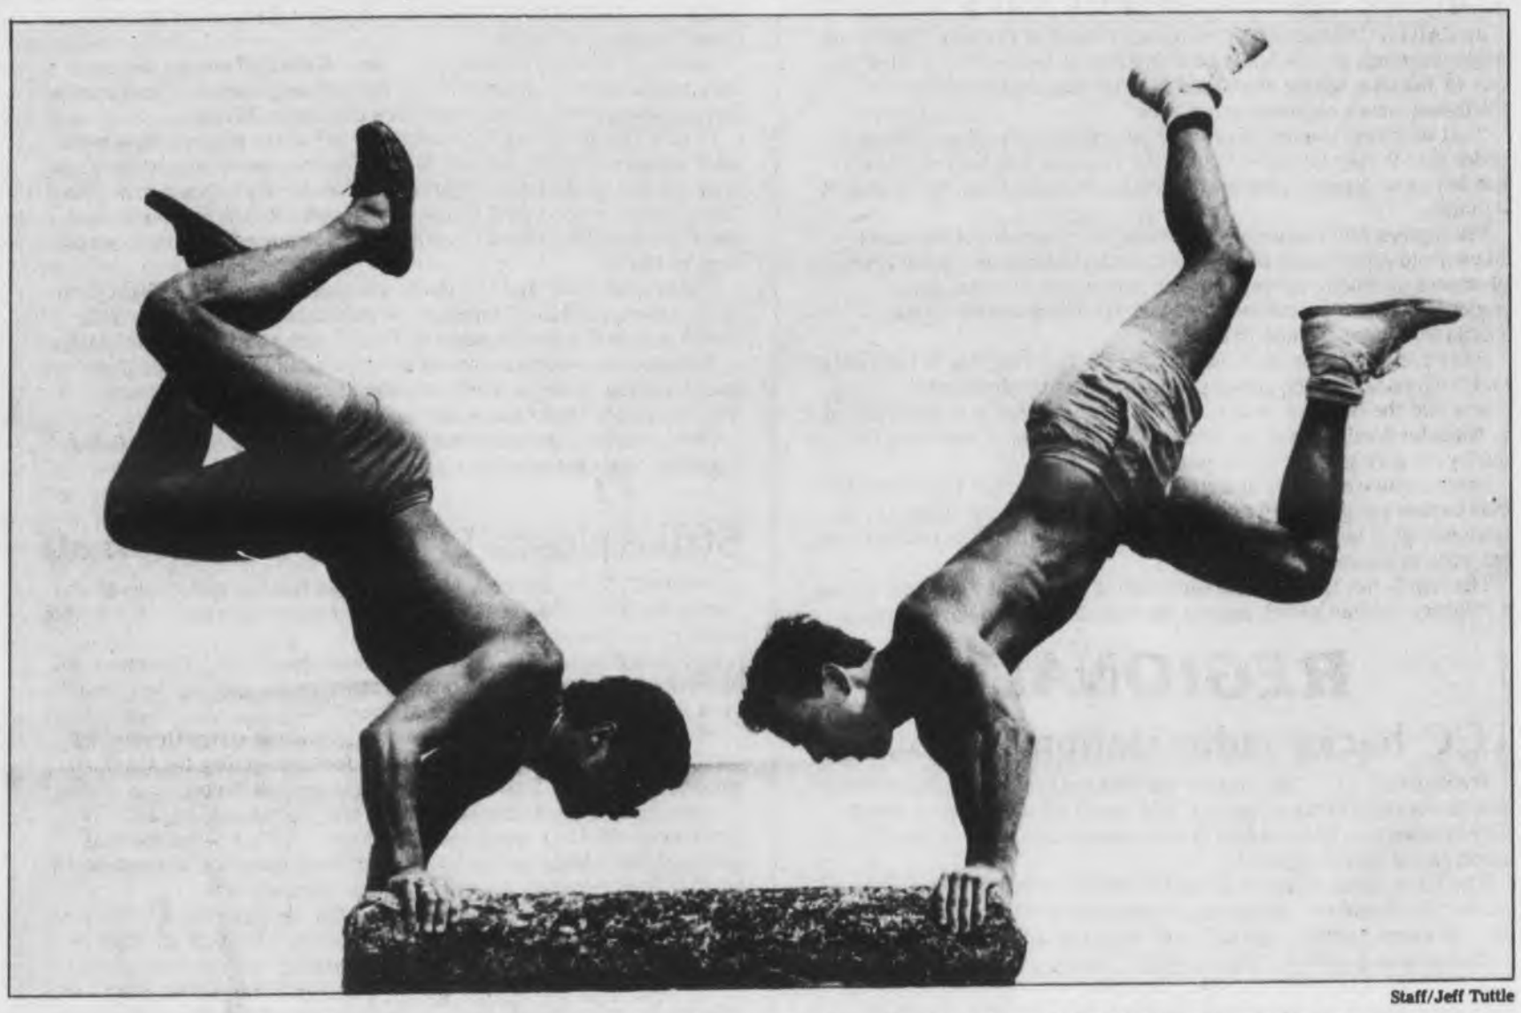
Because recruitment is a year-long process, the recruitment for the 1986-87 school year was completed before Wefald arrived. However, "our enrollment will stabilize by the fall of 1987 and by the fall of 1988, enrollment will definitely be up," he said.

Wefald said the recruitment program is going through a centralization process.

"We tried to find out why enrollment was falling," he said. "One of the reasons was nobody was recruiting and the recruiting that was being done was all very decentralized. Some colleges were recruiting and some weren't. We are trying to centralize the effort more."

Wefald said the two goals behind the addition of the new recruiters will add to the visibility and credibility of the University in the future.

The first goal is to provide school districts in every Kansas county with direct access to the admissions process. Wefald said the University should provide this service because of its status as a land grant institution.



"Because of the small admissions staff it was not possible to cover all the school districts in the past, which was not fair," he said.

Wefald said the second goal of the program was to hire some of the brightest students who have graduated from the University as new recruiters.

"If you look at the college academic records and activities of the new recruiters, you will see that they were outstanding students," he said.

Following is a list of the new representatives: Tim Balfour, Abilene, fashion marketing; Tami Barham, St. George, psychology; Sara Doornbos, Scott City, marketing; Dana Fincher, Gardner, psychology; Maribeth Gottschalk, Hutchinson, journalism and mass communications; Becky Klingler, Manhattan, marketing; Alesia Martin, Hoisington, secondary educa-

Concert sounds off welcome

Four bands play for students

About 50 students danced between the bandstand and the audience of an estimated 1,500 people as Johnny Reno & The Sax Maniacs concluded the "Welcome Back Concert" Sunday afternoon.

The sixth annual concert, from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. in Memorial Stadium, opened with a premiere performance by White Lightning followed by The Dial Tones, Walk the West and Johnny Reno & The Sax Maniacs.

"It's (the concert) been really good but this is what I've been waiting for," said Michele Bostick, junior in retail floriculture, as Johnny Reno & The Sax Maniacs began to play.

Students dance to the rock 'n' roll sounds of Johnny Reno & the Sax Maniacs during the Welcome Back Concert Sunday at Memorial Stadium.

Students danced, applauded and whistled for Johnny Reno & The Sax Maniacs more than any other band at the concert.

"We have a great following here," Reno said.

Diana Swickard, junior in interior design, said she and a friend went to the concert just to see that band.

"We came because you don't have to pay $4 to see Johnny Reno & The Sax Maniacs — and you can get a tan," she said.

"Not everyone gets to see Johnny Reno because he plays in '21 bars' in Manhattan," said Julie Stephens, senior in social sciences and chairwoman for the Union Program Council Special Events Committee, which sponsored the Welcome Back Concert. "It gave students (under 21) the opportunity to see them."

"I came to see Walk the West and Johnny Reno, and to check out the new bands," said Neal Climenhaga, senior in English.

"We've got a good variety of bands this year," Stephens said. "Last year both bands we brought in had already established a following. We tried to do that again with Johnny Reno but in addition, we brought in bands that K-State students hadn't had as much exposure to," she said.

Last year's concert featured Steve Bob & Rich and The Dogs?.

Reno said the music his band plays is "rock and roll, kind of like Huey Lewis."

John Golemon, bass guitarist for Walk the West, described his band's sound as "basically rock 'n' roll with some southern roots and a little bit of blues and western rock."

The Dial Tones is promoted as a vintage rock band and White Lightning's lead singer characterized his band's music as "rock-a-billy."

As the bands played, temperatures rose to about 90 degrees during the partly cloudy and humid afternoon.

Despite the heat, about 50 people played Hacky Sack or Frisbee on the stadium lawn.

"I think it's nice that the school puts on things like this," said Beverly Sanders, graduate student in education.

"It gives us a day to recuperate from the week of partying before classes," said Chris Kern, junior in architecture.

Stephens said she believed the size of the audience was about the same as last year's.

Radio station KQLA helped to promote this year's concert, she said.

Committee to draft legislative proposal for satellite system

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

With the appointment of a new committee and approval of a budget request, the planning stages of the proposed Educational Satellite Communication Center at the University have begun.

President Jon Wefald asked the new committee to take the original plan for the project presented to the Board of Regents and shape it into a proposal for legislative review in 1987.

When completed, the center would be made up of centralized, high-quality professional studios and equipment with the capacity to create programming and transfer it by satellite uplink to areas around the state, nation and around the world, said Bob Lowman, assistant dean of the Graduate School and chairman of the committee.

The Regents have already approved the request of $1.5 million for the on-campus telecommunications center to be included in a budget request for fiscal year 1988.

For development of the proposal, the committee is currently discussing management aspects of the project, Lowman said.

"Right now the committee is addressing such issues as how the center will work administratively with the other Regents' schools which will also use the facility, how it will work with departments on campus, how course credits will be implemented, and where the facility will be housed — whether a new building will be required or an existing campus building can be used," he said.

Wefald said the committee is composed of various faculty representing a large segment of the University's departments.

"The committee is responsible for developing the programmatic thrust for the whole project so that in the final stages of the project we will

Thousands mourn 14 lives lost in post office killing spree

Officials, citizens grieve employee deaths

From Staff and Wire Reports

EDMOND, Okla. — Thousands of mourners attended a memorial service Sunday for 14 Postal Service employees killed by a co-worker who opened fire before committing suicide.

The gunman, Patrick Henry Sherrill, who walked into the Edmond Post Office on Wednesday and began shooting, was buried several hours earlier.

Sunday was declared an official day of mourning by Gov. George Nigh, who joined Postmaster General Robert Preston Tisch, Mayor Carl Reherman and 3,500 others at the Central State University football stadium for the 50-minute memorial.

Fourteen rows of the stadium's bleachers were left empty in memory of those killed.

"The empty seats behind the families represent the empty feelings we feel today in this community," Nigh said. "The fullness of the crowd represents the fullness of our love for you."

Locally, Manhattan Postmaster Marvin Roth expressed his office's reaction to the murders.

"We were shocked, stunned and hurt," he said of the murders. "I think that any time you have people that share the same work experience you think about it.

"It's been on the minds of everybody here."

While the murders had an emotional impact on the employees of Manhattan's post office, they probably will not have an operational one, Roth said.

He said he is convinced every security measure that can be practically implemented is already in place.

"With all of the post offices we have in the United States, where do you start infringing on one's rights and liberties to protect security? There's no answer. I think if you have a demented mind you'll get it in one way or another," Roth said.

He refused comment when asked if there have been any security problems at the Manhattan Post Office.

Roth said he doesn't think any sigificant changes in operation will occur in the immediate future because of the murders.

There have been reports that Sherrill was disciplined improperly, but Roth said he did not know the type of reprimand Sherrill encountered.

"As a rule there are procedures to follow when discipline is necesssary," he said. Furthermore, if Sherrill did feel he was treated wrongly, he could have sought recourse from his union.

Murders provoke questions psychologists can't answer

By DERON JOHNSON
Features Editor

As the suburban Oklahoma town of Edmond buries the victims of last week's post office massacre, persons across the nation are struggling to comprehend why it happened. According to an instructor of abnormal psychology, the answers may never come.

Jerome Frieman, associate professor of psychology, said the motivators that prompted Patrick Sherrill to kill 14 of his co-workers before turning the gun on himself may never be fully known.

"We don't know too much about people who do this because they get killed in the process," Frieman said.

What is known about Sherrill is sketchy and often conflicting. Some neighbors had labeled him "crazy Pat" because of his alleged peepings into neighborhood windows and his apparent fascination with guns.

Still others have described him as a bit introverted but warm and friendly. But nearly all agree that Sherrill led a basically unremarkable life.

Unremarkable, that is, until the morning of Aug. 20. That's when Sherrill, one day after being reprimanded for poor work performance, gunned down his co-workers in a random barrage of shots from his .45-caliber automatic handgun.

Pakistani officials warn opposition

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — The government warned Sunday it will resort to drastic measures unless opposition groups end their drive to oust President Mohammad Zia ul-Haq and force elections.

But leaders of the Movement for the Restoration of Democracy, an alliance of 11 opposition parties, said they would not abandon an anti-Zia campaign begun last Monday.

Only a few demonstrations were reported Sunday, including one by about 100 people in Karachi in southern Pakistan. Officials said security forces seized six protesters and quickly dispersed the crowd.

A peaceful march by about 2,000 people was reported in the eastern city of Lahore along with a non-violent procession in the southern town of Hala.

At least 29 people were killed and scores injured in demonstrations that began Aug. 13 when the government arrested about 500 opposition leaders. Top opposition figure Benazir Bhutto was arrested Aug. 14 and remained jailed Sunday.

Aquino travels despite coup threats

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Philippines President Corazon Aquino put aside warnings of a possible coup attempt at home and traveled Sunday to Jakarta, where she called for new momentum within Southeast Asia's regional association.

"Let us invest the organizaton of our region with all our efforts in order that it may continue to play the valuable role that its history has led us to expect," she said at a state banquet given by President Suharto.

Philippines and Indonesia are among six members of the nearly 20-year-old Association of Southeast Asian Nations, or ASEAN, which promotes economic cooperation but sometimes also discusses regional political problems. The other members are Malaysia, Thailand, Singapore and Brunei.

Before leaving Manila on Sunday for the four-day trip to Indonesia and Singapore, Aquino called it a "journey of brotherhood."

She told the banquet in Jakarta, "We believe that it is appropriate to consider fresh...ideas, particularly in the fields of trade and industry, to give greater momentum to ASEAN."

Some Aquino advisers had suggested she cancel her trip, warning that backers of ousted President Ferdinand E. Marcos might try to grab power in her absence and that Marcos might try to return from his exile in Hawaii.

The trip is her first abroad since taking office last February during a military-civilian revolt against Marcos' 20-year-old government.

FCC backs radio station takeover

WASHINGTON — The staff of the Federal Communications Commission is supporting a proposal that could allow a group of Dodge City residents to gain control of a controversial radio station that aired racial hate programs.

The Mass Media Bureau of the FCC says the settlement proposed earlier this month by the group, Community Service Broadcasting Inc., is in the "public interest" and should be approved.

The proposal calls for Charles Babbs, owner of the 100,000-watt station formerly called KTTL-FM, to abandon his efforts to renew the operating license of the station, which is now known as KMCS-FM.

Community Service, which has a competing application for the station's license, would pay Babbs $10,000 to drop out of the case and has asked the FCC to award it a construction permit if the settlement is approved.

KAL 007 misidentified, report says

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence information shows that Soviet military officers believed they were firing at an American reconaissance plane when they ordered the downing of a South Korean airliner three years ago, according to a magazine article.

The article said President Reagan had "initially rushed to judgement" in concluding — on the basis of preliminary intelligence reports — that the Soviets had knowingly shot down a civilian airliner for intruding into their airspace.

The president and other top officials "chose to look the other way when better information became available about the Soviet confusion of Flight 007 with longstanding American reconaissance missions," the story said. "Those who ran the American government did not want to learn that the Soviets had been honestly confused and panic-stricken about the enemy intruder..."

The article, appearing in the September issue of The Atlantic Monthly, was written by journalist Seymour M. Hersh. It will be part of his upcoming book on the incident in which 269 people died on Sept. 1, 1983.

Hersh has been investigating the plane's downing for two years, and was invited to the Soviet Union in May 1984 to interview top Soviet military officials.

The story says the Korean Air Lines 747 was off course due to errors by the crew in programming the jetliner's computerized inertial navigation system, which controlled the automatic pilot.

In fact, the error that led eventually led to the plane's flight path over sensitive Soviet military installations occurred before the plane ever left the ground at Anchorage, Alaska for its trip to Seoul. The flight engineer entered a single wrong digit into the computer, and the crew somehow failed to catch the error during the flight, according to Hersh.

The article notes that the plane was guided toward the flight path of an American RC-135 intelligence plane code-named Cobra Ball, which was in the air the night of Aug. 31 when Flight 007 left Alaska.

The spy plane operates out of a little-known Strategic Air Command base at Shemya, in the Aleutian archipelago of the North Pacific, and is used to monitor Soviet missile tests.

Hersh said the Soviets thought there were two U.S. planes flying together over that country's Kamchatka Peninsula.

Strike closes 11 Deere & Co. plants

MOLINE, Ill. — Deere & Co. announced Sunday that it was shutting down production at 11 factories because of a strike by 4,300 union workers at three other plants.

But United Auto Workers officials instructed the 7,700 workers not on strike to report for their normal shifts today, raising the possibility of a confrontation with the company.

"Deere & Co. considers the union's decision to strike three of its facilities as a strike against all Deere factories under the UAW master agreement," said Deere spokesman Bob Shoup.

After the company announcement, Bill Casstevens, a UAW spokesman said in a prepared statement: "All UAW members at Deere plants which are not among the three on strike are instructed by the union to report for work on their normal shifts.

"If the members arrive at work and the company locks them out, the UAW will consider this a lockout and the members are then instructed to apply for unemployment benefits," the spokesman said.

The strike at a parts distribution center in Milan and at plants in Waterloo and Dubuque, Iowa, began Saturday after the contract expired. The two sides had been negotiating since April.

The union rejected a proposal calling for a 37-month contract in which the striking employees would have "the opportunity" for a raise, the company said in a statement.

Farrell simplifies access to collections, archives

By The Collegian Staff

A recent renovation in Farrell Library will now provide better research conditions for individuals who use the Special Collections Department and the University Archives.

Starting Aug. 25, a new research room will be open in Room 502A for public use, said Antonia Pigno, coordinator for special collections.

Instead of ringing the traditional buzzer to gain entry into Room 501, where rare and unique collections are housed, researchers may enter the unlocked adjacent room and request items they need.

A former storage room, Room 502A now contains four research tables, a Xerox machine, card catalogs, a history index, Royal Purple yearbooks, microfilm and microfiche machines and a vertical file.

QUESTION #1.

WHAT IS THE RIGHT CHOICE FOR MOST COLLEGE STUDENTS?

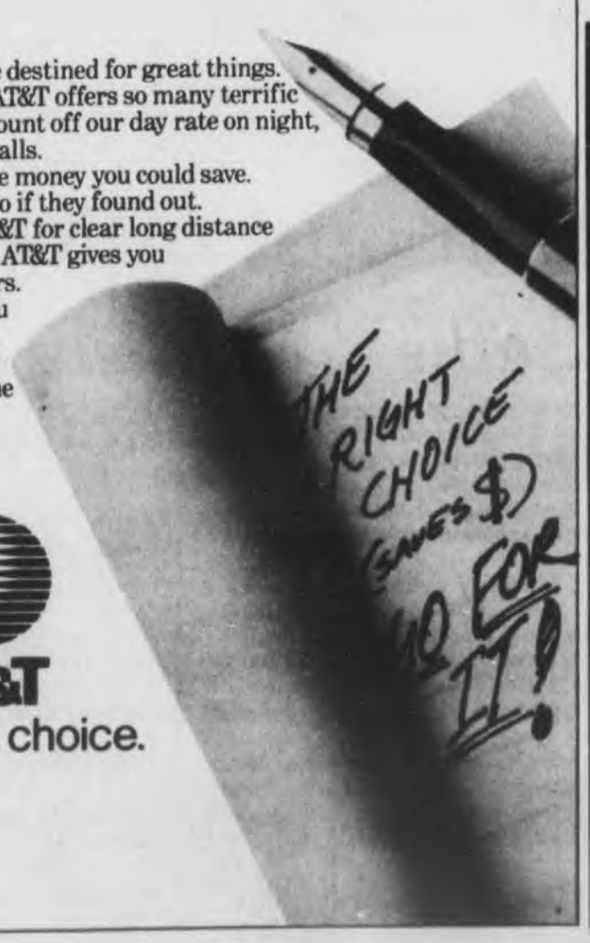
a) AT&T—for everyday discounts of 40% to over 50% off weekday rates on out-of-state calls.

b) Short bursts of intense study followed by hours of frantic partying.

c) AT&T—for exceptional value and high quality service.

d) AT&T—for collect, third-party and operator-assisted long distance calls.

e) Any class that does not conflict with "The Love Connection."



If you picked A, C and D, you're destined for great things. Like AT&T Long Distance Service. AT&T offers so many terrific values. Like a 40% to over 50% discount off our day rate on night, evening, and weekend out-of-state calls.

Imagine what you'll do with the money you could save. Imagine what your parents would do if they found out.

Of course, you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections any place you call. And AT&T gives you immediate credit for wrong numbers.

To find out more about why you should choose AT&T, give us a call. And if you picked B and E, call anyway. You could probably use someone to talk to.

Call toll-free today, at 1 800 222-0300.

Regents set to approve coliseum bids

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

Fred Bramlage Coliseum should be ready for operations by mid-October 1988, said Charles Hein, acting director of the coliseum.

The Coliseum Program Committee met July 7 to review a report from Tom Parkinson, coliseum marketing consultant. The committee made its own recommendations, and Bill Livingston of Gossen Livingston Associates of Wichita, architects for the coliseum, said changes in the 13,500-seat arena could be implemented to meet scheduled project deadlines.

Major changes requested by the committee include selling tickets from only the central ticket office, eliminating a glass wall from the north concourse, widening doors and redesigning some office space.

Contract documents for the coliseum were given to Warren Corman, director of facilities for the Kansas Board of Regents, on Aug. 1. The documents were approved, and they went out to contractors on Aug. 14, Hein said.

"They'll (the contractors) be doing their analyses of the plans now," Hein said. "We'll open the project for bids in Topeka on Sept. 23 around 2 p.m."

Hein said construction of the coliseum will begin sometime in October, should an acceptable low bid be approved by the Regents. The Regents will approve bids on Oct. 16.

"I anticipate completion in mid-October 1988 in time for the men's and women's basketball seasons," Hein said.

Hein said the total project cost is approximately $17.5 million.

"We almost have all the funds," Hein said. About $2 million is left to be collected through a student bond fee, Hein said.

Funding for the project has been a focal point since August 1985, when bids on the then 16,000-seat coliseum came in $3.4 million over budget. The Regents and the University then directed Gossen Livingston Associates to redesign the coliseum with 2,500 fewer seats, but still meet specifications for multi-purpose use. Hein said the current design meets the requirements.

"It's time to review what's been done in past years to see that no commitments made then are overlooked now. I intend to honor all of them," said Hein, who was appointed acting director of the coliseum on June 18.

He said publicity projects for the coliseum will be revealed after a bid is approved.

Airline grounds passengers, employees

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Frontier Airlines shut down early Sunday, stranding thousands of passengers throughout the West and idling nearly 4,700 workers, and threatened bankruptcy action if a merger with United Airlines wasn't worked out.

"We deeply regret that this step had to be taken but we were left with no choice. ...Frontier is out of funds," said a statement from New Jersey-based People Express Inc., which bought the ailing Denver-based carrier last fall.

People Express, also financially troubled, announced in July after a first-quarter loss of $58 million that it would sell Frontier.

United offered to buy Frontier, which lost $10 million a month in the first six months of 1986, for $146 million if agreements with Frontier's five labor unions could be reached by Aug. 31. United already has paid $53 million for Frontier assests that include landing slots and hangers.

"We are still interested in acquiring Frontier," said United spokesman Joe Hopkins.

Talks with the Air Line Pilots Association, the first of the five Frontier unions to talk with United, stalled over the issue of when Frontier pilots would begin receiving the same salaries as United pilots. Frontier pilots make about 40 percent less than United pilots.

Frontier employees have made a series of wage concessions over the last four years in efforts to save their jobs.

"Unless an agreement (with pilots) is reached, Frontier will file for bankruptcy tomorrow (Monday)," said Marilyn Mishkin, chief Frontier spokeswoman. "It's that or it's nothing."

But ALPA Vice Chairman Jamie Lindsay said: "The thing is still open. It's not over."

Later Sunday, United and the pilots' union called a hastily arranged negotiating session in Chicago, said United spokesman Kurt Stocker.

People Express indicated it would delay bankruptcy proceedings if United reached agreement with the pilots, Stocker said, adding he did not know how long that delay might be.

"It comes down to how fast they have to stop bleeding," he said.

Analysts have said the Frontier sale would help cash-hungry People Express, but that the survival of the 5-year-old airline would depend on whether it did well enough during the summer to get through the slower fall and winter months.

At People Express headquarters in Newark, N.J., spokesman Russell Marchetta said a bankruptcy filing would seal Frontier's fate.

"The new set of parameters that will be outlined by the bankruptcy court will make any acquisition much more difficult," said United spokesman Matt Gonring.

Frontier served 55 cities in the West, from Chicago to California and including four cities in Canada. An average 17,000 passengers flew each day.

At Denver's Stapleton International Airport, hundreds of stranded travelers had queued up at Continental and United counters by midmorning as the shutdown came on one of the heaviest travel days of the year.

At Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport, Bill Hale of Denver planned to catch a Frontier flight to Kansas City where he was meeting a private plane.

"I don't have time to wait through lines," Hale said as he thumbed through the telephone book at a pay telephone. "I don't have time even to ask if they'll honor the ticket. It's added a interesting dimension to a morning that wasn't."

Frontier customers may present their tickets to Continental and United for travel on many flights, subject to space availability, spokesmen for the two carriers said.

United also planned to hire 255 Frontier service and reservations agents to handle the increased load expected over the next two weeks, Hopkins said.

Continental will give pass privileges to Frontier flight crews and other employees stranded by the shutdown, said Continental spokesman Bruce E. Hicks in Houston.

In Dallas, spokesman Dan White said American Airlines would accept Frontier-issued tickets if they were purchased before Sunday and included travel on American or other airlines.

A Frontier collapse would be a major blow for Denver, where the carrier started nearly 40 years ago. All but 1,000 of its employees are in Colorado.

Lindsay of the ALPA said, "The blame for this current collapse lies squarely on United Airlines management."

Hopkins disagreed, noting that United had made six offers on the difference in pay for Frontier and United pilots. The latest offer would close the gap in five years. ALPA wants the gap closed by April 1988, he noted.

"That is exorbitant," Hopkins said. "We just couldn't afford to do that. Frontier is a failing carrier and it takes time to reverse their fortunes. It can't be done overnight."

K-State's purple pride becomes trashy event

When K-State was recognized nationally for having one of the best student unions in the country last spring, no one could have predicted what our new University President Jon Wefald's response would be to the award.

Certainly no one — except possibly Jeanne Dixon, syndicated psychic — could have foreseen the bright purple and white trash cans dotting campus sidewalks. The new image of the trash cans was suggested by Wefald as an expression of student spirit.

Union Programming Council bulletin boards have also been covered in purple and new purple carpeting is planned for the Union. A rumor is also circulating about the possible purple-izing of Wefald's office.

This is not the first time an administrator has attempted spiritual revival through paint. Athletic Director Larry Travis and company painted the steps of the KSU Stadium last fall.

While slapping on a fresh coat of paint might often sell a house to a naive buyer, it will not keep the buyer from discovering interior flaws. Students coming to campus for the first time will find they need more than bright trash cans to keep them here.

For the students already here a fresh coat of paint may be a refreshing change, but it does not reflect student spirit.

School spirit is founded on pride in the institution, its goals, its achievements and the achievements of all who have attended it. Spirit is not found externally, it develops over time, through experiences with other individuals along a similar path of life. In an educational setting it becomes a mass camaraderie.

Pride in the institution is vital. And the possibility is remote that "spiriting" trash cans and carpets are going to inspire students to instant Wildcat pride. The University could paint a better future for its graduates without painting the campus purple.

Collegian encourages public opinion, ideas

The Collegian staff extends greetings to students, faculty and staff as the new semester begins.

The purpose of the Collegian is to deliver campus, local, state, national and international news to K-State students.

The Collegian is not a public relations tool of the University. As the campus newspaper it is the Collegian's responsibility to report news and events accurately and objectively.

The newspaper is staffed entirely by students and is not controlled by the administration or faculty. Staff members may represent all departments in the University.

The editorial page is intended as a forum for student, faculty and staff opinion. Letters or columns from community members and alumni are also welcome. However, editorial material must meet legal and ethical standards.

The editorial board meets twice weekly to discuss campus and political issues, and to form a researched conclusion on pertinent issues.

Views stated in editorials that appear in this space represent a majority opinion of the board. Editorials may also be written by the editor and editorial page editor.

Replies to columns, which represent individual opinion, or to editorials may be made in the form of letters to the editor or guest columns.

Letters and columns will not be accepted without signature, and all material submitted to the Collegian is subject to verification.

On letters bearing more than one signature, only one name will be printed followed by the number of other signatures.

Letters to the editor must not exceed 250 words and must be typed or neatly written. Material submitted to the newspaper must contain the author's name, telephone number or address, and his or her year and major. Letters and guest columns must be presented with picture identification.

The Collegian reserves the right to reject or edit material for style and space considerations.

The staff is looking forward to a semester that promises many changes with a new administration, coaches, campus events and state elections. The Collegian will make every effort to report these events to the campus in an unbiased manner.

The Collegian encourages public comment on these issues and others pertinent to students as participants in campus activities, and as citizens of the state and nation. Readers are encouraged to use their right to free speech and express opinions on the editorial page of the Collegian.

Policy in Nicaragua proves insane

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

Why does Ronald Reagan hate the Sandinistas?

Why does he want hundreds of millions of U.S. tax dollars to blow them up? Does the president have reasons for this hatred or is he in need of intensive psychiatric help? Can shock treatments cure a mental disorder such as this?

These questions have been buzzing around my mind for some time and the noise is driving me crazy. To preserve my sanity, I am going to explore the possibility of our president being insane when it comes to Central American policy.

A reason Reagan uses for his hostility toward the Nicaraguan government is that the Soviet Union supplies the Sandinistas with military hardware. True, the Sandinistas have Soviet weapons, including Soviet attack helicopters. The funny thing is that the contras, Reagan's "freedom fighters," have Soviet-made SA-7 anti-aircraft missiles to shoot down the Sandinista's Soviet-made helicopters.

While this is not condemning evidence, the fact that the influx of Soviet weapons didn't start until after Reagan made it clear he hates the Sandinistas is proof this is not the real reason for his war in Nicaragua. U.S.-sponsored terrorism is the reason Soviet weapons are there.

But why does Reagan hate the Sandinistas? Maybe it is because, according to Reagan, the Sandinistas imposed a totalitarian regime on Nicaraguans. The truth of this allegation depends on the definition of totalitarian.

In Nicaragua, anyone can travel anywhere at any time. They can protest in the streets and speak against the government. According to a team of international observers, the 1984 elections were some of the fairest ever conducted in Central America in this century. I don't know about you, but this doesn't seem like life behind the Iron Curtain to me.

Maybe Reagan hates the Sandinistas because they are involved in drug smuggling. We know how much he hates drugs. But the Drug Enforcement Agency revealed they have no evidence of drug smuggling by the Sandinistas, except for a photo of someone carrying a box that could have contained Jimmy Hoffa's laundry for all we know. The DEA does have evidence of drug smuggling by the contras, but that's OK because they're Ronnie's buddies.

The reasons Reagan hates the Sandinistas don't check out. So when should we schedule the lobotomy? After all, the Sandinistas have been internationally recognized for dramatic advances in education and health care. Life in Nicaragua is better than ever despite a U.S. embargo and the contra war.

The World Court ruled that our actions in Nicaragua are against international law. The countries of Spain, France, Sweden, Italy, Denmark, Belgium, Ireland, Finland and the Netherlands are among the countries that support the Sandinistas.

So what is the reason Reagan wants to destroy the Sandinista's revolutionary government? The only answer I can come up with is power politics. Nicaragua broke from the U.S. economic sphere making the Nicaraguan people a little richer and a few U.S. businessmen a little poorer because the Sandinistas took over foreign-owned companies in Nicaragua. This policy is to prevent capital flight and outside economic influence. It's not a bad move considering economic conditions following the 1979 revolution, in which everything not stolen by the Somoza family was destroyed.

The term "communist" is often used to describe the Sandinistas. This shouldn't matter to us because we believe people should be free to choose their government. The U.S. government seems to take exception to communist government, even if the people want it.

A 1949 Department of State intelligence document stated that communists are people who believe "the government has a direct responsibility for the welfare of the people."

This may seem kind of strange, but they also say other things. State Department document PPS23, February 1948, states "...We should cease to talk about vague and...unreal objectives such as human rights, the raising of the living standards, and democratization. The day is not far off when we are going to have to deal in straight power concepts. The less we are then hampered by idealistic slogans, the better."

In other words, to hell with the rest of the world. The only thing we want from you is your money and power — kind of a revised version of the Hitler doctrine — he hated communists, too.

This means President Reagan must destroy Nicaragua to comply with the revised Hitler doctrine. If he doesn't, other countries in the region will get the idea they can better themselves the same way and this would cause us to lose "our little region down there." This would make a lot of businessmen in this country very angry. To be loyal to his backers, the president continues the contra war even though two-thirds of Americans oppose it.

So Reagan is not really crazy, as far as I can tell. It is just that people don't understand his motives for the war in Nicaragua are money and power, not human rights and democracy.

I don't like what the president is doing in Central America. If all citizens knew what his motives are, would they also wonder if he should receive shock treatments? Or would they seek therapy themselves for being deceived in "the most open society on earth?" Is there enough electicity to go around?

Fun times await K-State freshmen

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

"Hi ho, hi ho, it's off to school we go..."

For the vast — or better yet "broke" — majority of students, this year is not the first. Rather, they're returning for another year of education, fun and dirty laundry, not in that order.

Because upperclassmen and women have been around — so to speak — it's only fair to have an opportunity to pass along information guaranteed to make the freshman year less painful. Stifle the applause and eat your tomatoes; don't throw them, please!

Before continuing be forewarned that not all classified information will be revealed about how to make it through freshman year without being mistaken for one. Upperclassmen need a few laughs now and then. They're not laughing at you — they're laughing with you. You'll think it's funny, too, three years from now, give or take a couple of semesters.

This first bit of advice may come a little late for use this semester, but file it and make use of it in January. When paying tuition, picking up financial aid or trying to escape crazed Kansas City Times salesmen at Ahearn Field House, never go at your appointed time. Why? Unless you delight in standing in long lines, sweating like a pig and looking very freshmanly, screw up the whole system and go whenever you darn well please. You can pay tuition any time to avoid long lines and the funny looks from upperclassmen.

After following that "tip," you have at least two extra hours to roam campus and check out what the University has to offer. Try to do this incognito — no high school letter jackets, T-shirts or ballcaps. This is the big time now. Wear all the purple you want. You'll show K-State pride and perhaps more important, you'll make University President Jon Wefald and the administration very happy. However, be careful not to be mistaken for a Union floor mat or campus trash can.

Don't spend too much time on campus, however, because you'll spend too many fun-filled hours in the pursuit of higher education — i.e. passing grades — in the coming months. Instead, it's time to check out "The Little Apple," Manhattan. Granted, cruising Aggieville is lots of fun, but try to limit yourself to four or five circuits down Moro Street. More than 28 trips is not only tacky, but also expensive in terms of wasted gas and little to no chance of picking up a member of the opposite sex. It's also been known to increase your insurance rate as each successive trip is directly proportional to the chances of some drunken fool (that's what you call them until that fool is you) crashing into or throwing up on you.

An additional freshman activity is a daily trip to Wal-Mart, which awaits with open doors and check-out women to put a sticker on all your personal possessions. Try not to purchase too much, and hide such great buys as shower caddies and magnetic memo boards under all the candy bars and potato chips.

The real fun doesn't begin until you reach the checkout lanes. You plunk down all your items, trying not to panic as you notice that one of your most "personal" items isn't marked with a price. After suffering through the wait, you think you've been through the worst. Then you hear that sweet checkout person's voice ring out, "Is this your current address on your check?"

"Uh well, golly gee, I guess not. No, I really don't live at the White House, but I had you fooled there, just for a minute," you answer. Don't panic. Instead of whipping out every form of identification you possess, even though now would be a great time to test your fake I.D., just greet this question — or rather, scathing public insult — with a direct "no, it's not," grab your bags and head for the door. The checker will be dumbfounded by your answer.

This brief but invaluable list of activities should suffice for freshman who are no longer eligible to drink beer — at least not in Aggieville. It will at least get you through the first few days of freshmanhood. After that, you'll know it all anyway, so you're on your own. Freshman year is fun, full of good times and lots of laughs. So what if a few too many of those are directed at you? Revenge will be oh so sweet in three years or so!

Despite three artist's delays, attorney expects new mural

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Although the artist of the Nichols Hall mural has delayed completion three times, there has been no indication that it won't be completed by the Sept. 30 deadline, said Dianne Urban, students' attorney.

Urban is the legal adviser for the Nichols Hall Art Committee and has drawn up the contracts and revisions for the mural project.

Urban said Jerry Katlin, student body president during the commissioning of the mural, recently received a series of production photographs from the artist, Eric Bransby. Bransby is working on the mural at his studio in Colorado Springs, Colo.

"The photographs show a mural very similar to the model originally designed for the Nichols mural," said Urban, "But no note or letter was sent with the photographs, so we have no idea whether they are just pictures of a sketch or the actual mural. We're assuming it is the actual mural and that the artist will complete the mural by the September deadline."

Bransby was commissioned to do the artwork for the mural in July 1984, after winning a University-sponsored contest to find an artist. The mural was originally scheduled to be completed Aug. 15, 1985.

"The committee later received a letter from Bransby, which said that he was having difficulty setting up his new studio in Colorado Springs and would not be able to complete the mural by the August deadline," Urban said.

The original agreement was then modified, and the completion date was set for Jan. 15, 1986.

On Nov. 7, 1985, the committee received a second letter from Bransby. In the letter Bransby said he had been suffering from eye problems and had also received an urgent request from the Colorado Springs Fine Arts Center to help them with deteriorating frescoes on the building's entry facade. He said he would not be able to meet the January deadline.

A second modification was made in the agreement, and the completion date was set for the current September deadline.

Urban said if the mural is not completed by that time, the University will activate a liquidated damages clause agreement, whereby the artist will be charged $100 a day in damages for each day past the deadline.

Bransby received a payment of $3,200 at the time he was commissioned to do the artwork, Urban said. He will receive the remaining balance of $4,800 upon completion.

Financing for the mural came from funds allocated by Student Senate for the preservation of Nichols Hall, she said.

When completed, the mural, "Achievements," will hang in the lobby of Nichols Hall. The subject matter of the mural deals with student achievement and emphasizes athletics. In the artist's contract, the mural is described as being made up of artwork on more than 20 Masonite panels, with some painting directly on the lobby wall.

Gas fumes kill 300 in West Africa

By The Associated Press

YAOUNDE, Cameroon — Toxic gas escaping from a lake in a volcanic crater in northwest Cameroon is believed to have killed at least 300 people, government sources said Sunday.

Travelers from the region arriving in the capital of Yaounde said as many as 1,000 people may have perished. The government's initial statement, the only official report to mention casualties, said 40 people had been killed so far by gas seepage that began Friday.

A later government communique said President Paul Biya visited the region near the Nigerian border Sunday and declared it a disaster area. At least three villages were affected, according to the communique read over state television.

It identified the toxic fumes as hydrogen sulfide, a flammable, poisonous gas. It called the escape of the gas from the volcanic lake a "geological catastrophe."

Hydrogen sulfide is colorless and smells like rotten eggs. It usually is formed by putrefaction, such as the decomposition of animal matter that is found in most volcanic gases and many natural gas and petroleum deposits.

Yaounde Radio, in its report monitored in London, said Biya went to the region to show his solidarity with the "disaster-stricken population."

It said the leak had claimed many victims and the situation had worsened but did not elaborate.

The Cameroon government has called for international aid to help with the disaster, and the communique said the United States and Britain agreed to supply logistical support for evacuation of villagers from the Menchum region. Israel is providing 15 doctors and nurses and France offered unspecified material help.

In Washington, State Department spokeswoman Anita Stockman said, "We are prepared to provide assistance to the government of Cameroon based on what we've seen from press reports. The Cameroon government will be assessing the damage, and at that point we'll know what the needs are."

Kickoff greets students, administrators

Staff/Robert Squires

President Jon Wefald and students say hello for a taped segment of "Good Morning America" at Kickoff '86.

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

An occasional purple balloon drifted up into the Kansas air Saturday night after being released from a strange spectacle in KSU Stadium during Kickoff '86.

The kickoff provided the setting for the first formal introduction this school year of the new football coach, Stan Parrish, and the new president, Jon Wefald, to the student body. Student Body President Steven Johnson also welcomed new and returning students to the campus.

A series of get-acquainted activities designed by Playfair were played by several hundred students and supporters. Playfair uses games to help put people at ease and allow them to make new friends in strange surroundings.

The audience at one point in the evening was encouraged by the Playfair leader to link arms with a partner and perform the "back-to-back boogie." This activity was described as "the dance where you can check out everyone but your partner."

The audience was encouraged to get involved in the Playfair activities because, as the leader said, "Ten people will fall passionately in love with you and follow you around campus the rest of the year."

During his speech, Wefald encouraged students to be the best possible students they could be. He added, however, it is important that students also enjoy themselves while attending K-State.

All aspects of college life should be brought together to create a good university and also to create an enjoyable college experience for students, he said.

"We want to be the best academically, but we also want to be competitive in intercollegiate athletics," Wefald said.

Parrish said he believed student support was needed for a good football team.

"Come out one weekend and watch the team play. If you don't like what you see, don't come back. I feel that strongly about our team," Parrish said.

"We haven't won a home game in two years. That will change next Saturday, but we need your support," he said. "Don't just sit on your hands...you all want to beat them just as badly as I do."

Parrish discussed the fact that Wefald had shown up at a football practice and added, "He (Wefald) has shown more interest in a short amount of time than any administrator I've known."

Also included as part of the evening's activities was a performance by the KSU Marching Band along with the KSU Cheerleaders and Willie the Wildcat.

Students gathered around Wefald and shouted "Good Morning America" for the traditional opening of ABC's morning news show. The segment will be aired later in the fall.

K-State started using Playfair three years ago with the residence halls to help the new residents become acquainted.

William Arck, director of the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service and chairman of the Kickoff '86 committee, said the idea of using Playfair during the welcome back activity was developed the second year by Larry Travis, director of intercollegiate athletics at K-State.

"There are many different benefits for different groups," Arck said. "The athletic department can show off their new football team and coach. With all their coverage, BADD (Bartenders Against Drunk Drivers), one of the major sponsors, will be able to increase the usage of their BADD cab rides. It's a great get-aquainted party for all the students. Everyone can get a little bit involved."

Arck said the kickoff event has already become a tradition at K-State, and added, "the athletic department and Greek Affairs are very committed to the idea."

Arck said the increased drinking age did enter into the decision-making when developing the event, but he said it was not the cause.

"I see the event as somewhat addressing the increased drinking age issue, but the event is also held because it is basically a good time," he said. "I see it as just a positive program."

Rain delays construction of lot; builders slate Sept. 1 completion

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Unusually high rainfall has hampered completion of parking lot construction east of McCain Auditorium, resulting in the loss of 112 parking spaces.

Construction of the $132,950 lot was to be completed by Aug. 1, but the weather has delayed the schedule by a month. However, the lot could be completed by Aug. 31 if good weather holds, said Neil Horton, project manager for Bayer Construction.

About 70 parking spaces already completed were to be available for student, staff and faculty parking today with one entrance open on Vattier Street, said Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police.

"We hope to have 90 percent available by the end of this week, but the weather is the key factor," he said.

Horton said the increased rainfall caused the loss of three weeks construction time on the lot from the time the project began on June 16 through the end of July. Above normal rainfall has slowed progress in August as well, with Manhattan recording 5.05 inches of rain, more than 3 inches above normal for August.

"If you look around town you can see the people that are working the ground are slowing down a day or two after the rain," Horton said.

Rushing the construction process would be poor business judgment on the part of the contractor as well as the owner of the property, said Burke Bayer, owner of Bayer Construction.

The soil under the lot must be dry before concrete can be poured. If the soil is wet, the poured concrete would be in a constant condition of sinking or swelling as it dries, Bayer said. This reduces the strength and durability of the finished lot.

"It's an act of God that a fellow just has to let wait," he said.

The contractor was ahead of schedule tearing up the old lot and beginning the new construction, Beckom said.

"Had it not been for the rains, he would have been done two or three weeks ago," he said.

Construction of the lot will result in the loss of five spaces. By switching to perpendicular parking, a buffer will be created between a stone wall which parallels Anderson Avenue and the lot, Beckom said.

He also said the improved landscaping in this area will make the lot more aesthetically pleasing.

Theologian wary of Vatican action

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Roman Catholic theologian Charles Curran said Sunday the Vatican decision to censure him for his views on sexual issues could scare talented teachers away from church schools.

"Unfortunately, the process might drive Catholic theologians out of Catholic institutions," the priest said. "One of the most tremendous ironies would be that Catholic theologians now would feel uncomfortable in Catholic institutions."

The church revoked Curran's commission to teach at the Catholic University of America, a Washington school with direct ties to the Vatican, because he had publicly dissented from its stand that abortion, artificial contraception and divorce can never be morally justified.

Public opinion polls show many U.S. Catholics share Curran's dissent.

Curran, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," repeated his intention to fight the Vatican's ruling.

The letter revoking his commission also stated "that I cannot exercise the function of a professor of Catholic theology anywhere at a Catholic institution," implying that he could not teach at any school that describes itself as Catholic, he said.

"Actually, I have stayed at Catholic University now for over 20 years despite offers to go elsewhere because I really see my theology as being done for the church," Curran said.

"I think it is very important for the church to have the role of theology as continually pushing, probing, asking questions, trying to relate the gospel of Jesus Christ to the world in which we live."

Archbishop John P. Foley, appearing on the same program, defended the censure.

Tax plan may hurt states' funds

By The Associated Press

HILTON HEAD ISLAND, S.C. — The congressional tax plan is unfair to the states, but fighting its inevitable passage could leave the states facing even worse legislation, Colorado Gov. Richard Lamm told fellow governors Sunday.

"Despite the fact that it's bad tax policy, it has a head of steam behind it," Lamm told the executive committee of the National Governors' Association, which is holding its annual conference here.

A last-ditch battle against the legislation is "probably not only not winnable but is almost quixotic," said Lamm, head of the association's committee on taxes.

Even though many states would get a revenue windfall from the compromise tax legislation, its elimination of the state sales tax deduction would hurt state and local governments in 45 states, Lamm said.

According to the association, 45 states have some kind of sales tax, and removing the deduction is seen as pressuring states to shift their revenue base to deductible taxes, such as those on income and property.

"Except for the five states that do not have a sales tax, all states lose," according to an analysis released by the group. "Some states with a heavy reliance on sales taxes may have to enact or strengthen the income tax."

And because of major restrictions on issuing tax-free municipal bonds, states can expect an average reduction of 50 percent in the amount of bonds they will be able to issue, the analysis said.

The governors' association said that even with the bond and sales tax problems, 35 states will receive an effective increase in revenues of 2 percent to 5 percent because of the federal changes.

Four states — Nebraska, North Dakota, Rhode Island and Vermont — would lose 1 percent of revenue or less because of the way their taxes are tied to an individual's federal tax liability.

Eleven states would see no revenue loss or gain, the analysis said. They are Alaska, Florida, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Washington and Wyoming.

The governors have supported the drive for tax overhaul and simplification, and the bill agreed to last week by House and Senate conferees contains many of the goals sought by the governors: a broadened tax base, lower overall rates and a big reduction or elimination of income taxes for low-income Americans.

Costs increase for transcript copies

Due to an increase in administrative costs, the fee for transcript reproduction increased from $1 to $2 on July 1, 1986.

Approximately one-third of the 40,000 transcripts issued each year are provided to currently enrolled students with the remaining two-thirds to former student of the University.

Library announces 1986 fall hours

Farrell Library will be open from 7:30 a.m. to 11 p.m. Monday through Thursday, 7:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Friday, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Saturday and 1 p.m. to 11 p.m. on Sunday.

The library will be closed Aug. 30 and 31 for Labor Day weekend. On Labor Day, Sept. 1, hours will be from 1 p.m. to 11 p.m. and will return to regular fall hours on Sept. 2.

K-State Players to hold auditions

K-State Players has scheduled auditions for the first three shows of the 1986-87 season. Auditions for "Night Mother," "Oklahoma" and "The Constant Wife" will be at 7 p.m. Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday in Nichols Hall lobby.

All currently enrolled University students are welcome to audition.

Engineering panel to assist students

A placement orientation meeting for seniors and graduate students in the College of Engineering will be from 3:30 p.m. to 5 p.m. on Thursday in Forum Hall. The placement registration forms will be issued and a panel of professional engineers will be available to answer questions.

Business college to hold orientation

Seniors and graduate students in the College of Business Administration will have a placement orientation meeting in Forum Hall on Wednesday from 3:30 p.m. to 5 p.m. A panel of University recruiters will be available to answer questions and placement registration forms will be issued.

Fund to assist engineering students

A student loan fund honoring a longtime Southwestern Bell employee and his wife has been established at the University.

The Mr. and Mrs. Henry Ruff Loan Fund will benefit students majoring in electrical or mechanical engineering and will be managed by the KSU Foundation.

"I wanted to make it financially possible for students to obtain their engineering degrees," said Henry Ruff, a 1932 mechanical engineering graduate.

"The fund is also a tribute to the memory of some fine teachers and to the Alumni Association's loan program which loaned me money to complete my degree," he said.

Funds for the endowment have been provided by the Ruffs and by matching funds from Southwestern Bell Telephone Company. Students participating in the loan program will be selected by the Office of Student Financial Assistance based on recommendations from the dean of the College of Engineering. Selected students will be Kansas residents.

Recruit

tion; Amy Jo Reinhardt, Erie, agriculture economics; and Julie Schuler, Chapman, animal sciences and industry.

On Friday the new recruiters finished three weeks of intensive training which began on Aug. 4, Balfour said.

The training included classroom instruction from Wefald, Pat Bosco, assistant to the vice president of institutional advancement and Athletic Director Larry Travis, as well as other K-State officials, he said.

The recruiters spent time with the different colleges meeting each of the deans and learning the different curricula and program outlines. Balfour said the recruiters learned how each college has handled its prospective students in the past.

The recruiters also met with support groups on campus such as Student Financial Assistance and Career Planning and Placement, he said.

Each recruiter is assigned to one of nine geographical regions within the state and throughout the Midwest where they will spend their time visiting the high schools and junior colleges, he said. Four of the recruiters will live in their region, and all will maintain office space in Manhattan.

"We will be returning to the campus as much as possible and will stay in close touch with the University because it is our biggest drawing card," Balfour said.

The recruiters will start out in the field today but will return periodically for training sessions after they have been out on the road.

Balfour said he had positive expectations concerning his new job.

"I believe this recruiting effort will have a very positive effect in attracting new students to K-State," he said. "We will be concentrating on creating personal, one-on-one relationships. There is no way this could have a negative effect."

Klingler said the new recruiters will help increase enrollment because "they offer a personal service rather than just pointing students in a certain direction.

"Students don't have to talk to a faceless person on the phone or look at an impersonal pamphlet," she said.

Balfour also said each school system will be treated separately since all schools and their students are not the same. He said sometimes it is necessary to help the students choose between colleges but other times there is a major concern in just getting the students interested in attending college.

The recruiters work will consist of the two allowed official visits to the schools, working with the area alumni in coordinating events and working with prospective students outside of school hours, he said.

Balfour said during the first official visit, a large presentation will be given to the student body. During the second visit the recruiter will concentrate on working on a one-on-one basis with students who have signed up for interviews previously.

Wefald said the recruitment process should concentrate on recruiting the top students from high schools and junior colleges.

"By using these new recruiters we will be able to stabilize our enrollment by recruiting the best possible students," he said.

Wefald said the total recruitment program will not work unless every department is the best it can be and the faculty is caring and committed to the University.

Center

have a facility for various outreach, extension and other programming," Wefald said. "The committee will have to look at all of those various elements and develop them."

According to the Regents' proposal, the total budget for the center is more than $8.6 million. The $1.5 million request approved by the Board of Regents is the first portion of funds totaling $5.1 million to be spread over a four-year term.

The first funding would be used to purchase equipment and hire key staff members for the first studio in the telecommunications center, Lowman said.

"The most exciting part of this project is its potential to be used by areas all over the world," he said. "In areas of food marketing and food technology, for example, the telecommunications center will provide an opportunity for people in other countries to learn skills and obtain degrees in these areas without actually having to come here to school."

Lowman also said with the Telenet system already available at the University, the center would provide one-way video/two-way audio, so those using the facility could ask questions or have conferences.

"Another example of how the center will be used is in the College of Veterinary Medicine, where with technical video procedures, practitioners in veterinary medicine can further their skills by being able to watch complex surgical techniques on television sets in their own homes," Lowman said.

"The center would provide a much greater efficiency for those using it," he said.

Lowman said similar facilities are already being used at Oklahoma State University, Oregon State University and in the state of Virginia.

"The center will be in a good location here at K-State because the Midwest is known to have good reception and will have a similar advantage in broadcasting to satellites," he said.

Currently, the committee has been divided into subcommittees to look further into the project, Lowman said. One subcommittee will look into management, programming and effectiveness of the center. The second will examine the teaching aspects of the facility — how the center should be designed for its capacity to educate. The third subcommittee will study where the facility will be housed.

The whole committee will meet again on Aug. 29 to discuss these topics.

"The completion of the center will definitely add a dimension to the University and to the state," Lowman said. "There will be a lot of expertise from this University and other Regents schools that will make a large contribution to the whole project."

"It (the center) would provide even more opportunities for faculty to communicate to all parts of the state and contribute to enhancing education," Wefald said.

"The center would be both a production and a teaching facility for the University."

"I don't think you can predict who's going to pick up a gun and start blasting away at people," Frieman said. "Not everybody becomes a murderer" when told they will be fired.

Frieman said there is not any one motivator for such behavior.

"We do know that the greatest predictor of violence is one who's had violence in his background," he said. However not everyone who's been abused will respond by being violent against other people.

Often, victims who survive or those who witness the murders are scarred for life.

"What we've come to discover is that a traumatic experience, not just in childhood but in adulthood as well, has long-lasting effects," Frieman said. "These reactions in some cases can become quite debilitating."

Frieman said mass murderers fall into four categories. One is the instantaneous mass murder, such as in Edmond or in San Ysidro, Calif., where 21 persons were killed inside a McDonald's restaurant by a distraught unemployed security guard in 1984.

Another type of killer is the serial mass murder, a third is the short-term murder spree and the fourth category is the methodical murder of several persons in a short time span.

"The reasons why people are doing them (mass murders) are completely different," Frieman said.

The rehabilitation of mass murderers is often impossible.

"I don't know what you do with them," he said. "These people have no guilt."

Mourners

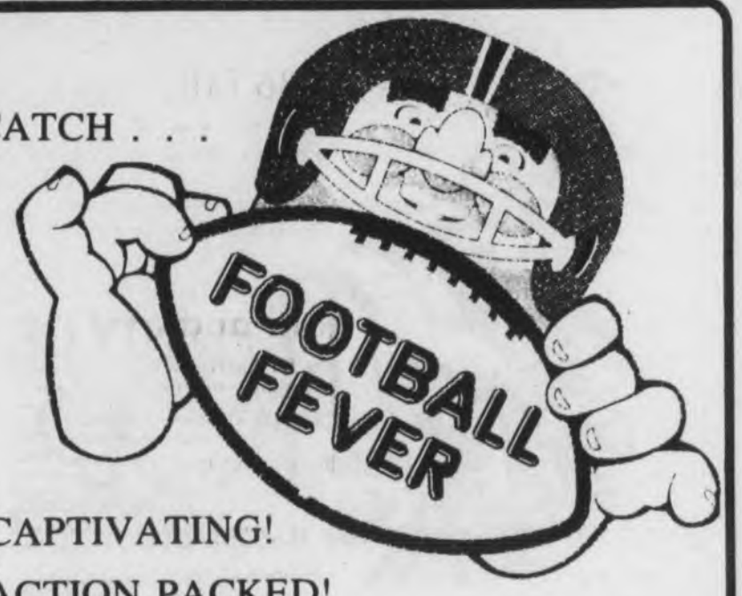
Postal Service officials have denied that the supervisors threatened to fire Sherrill.

Tisch, said in a written statement issued to reporters at the memorial which began at 4:10 p.m., "the families of Edmond, Okla., mourn on this day. The family that is the Postal Service mourns also.

"The 14 sons and daughers of Edmond have brothers and sisters in every city, town and village in this nation. At 40,000 post offices across the United States, the flag flies at half staff. At 40,000 post offices, men and women weep. ...The entire nation embraces Edmond on this day and pray you will be made whole again."

Eight victims of the shooting were buried Saturday with six of the burials taking place in Oklahoma. One was held in St. John, and another in Marietta, Ga. Four others were interred Friday.

And at the First Baptist Church of Edmond, only blocks from the shooting site, pastor Alan Day reminded congregation members to be mindful that "even our dearest loved ones can be snatched from us suddenly."



Although the theme of Day's sermon was not specifically the post office massacre, his talk was sprinkled with references to the shooting.

Day said he believed the shooting would prove a test of faith for the community. "But the real test of life is how we relate to others, and whether we are loving persons."

At Sherrill's funeral, his small urn was draped with flowers. Included was one bouquet from letter carriers in Irving, Texas, with a card that read: "To those who understand what he went through as a carrier. No one will ever know how far he was pushed to do what he did."

Parrish's air attack relies on Williams

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

The starting quarterback job belongs to Randy Williams.

No ifs, ands or buts. Barring injury, Williams will be the man taking the snaps when K-State opens its season Saturday night at KSU Stadium against Western Illinois.

Throughout most of the disappointing 1985 season, the question of who was the No. 1 quarterback lingered in the minds of resigned Head Coach Jim Dickey and interim Coach Lee Moon. Injuries, the opposition or even who seemed to be playing better at the time took their turns determining whether Williams or John Welch would be the starter from week to week.

This year, new Coach Stan Parrish has attempted to remove any doubt about the matter. Parrish named Williams the No. 1 quarterback at the close of spring drills and remains steadfast in his contention that Williams will be at the helm of his new passing offense.

That sits just fine with Williams, a 6-foot-2, 205 pound junior from Jacksonville, Fla.

"It makes me feel pretty good to know the coaches believe in me and let me have the starting job," Williams said.

Williams earned the job in spring drills by beating out Welch, a senior; and touted junior college transfer Tim Hanson.

"It was an intense battle between the three of us, but it really helps us. I had to establish myself all over again," Williams said. "Competition is always healthy because we can learn from each other. We can also push each other. The other one can never let up or take it easy."

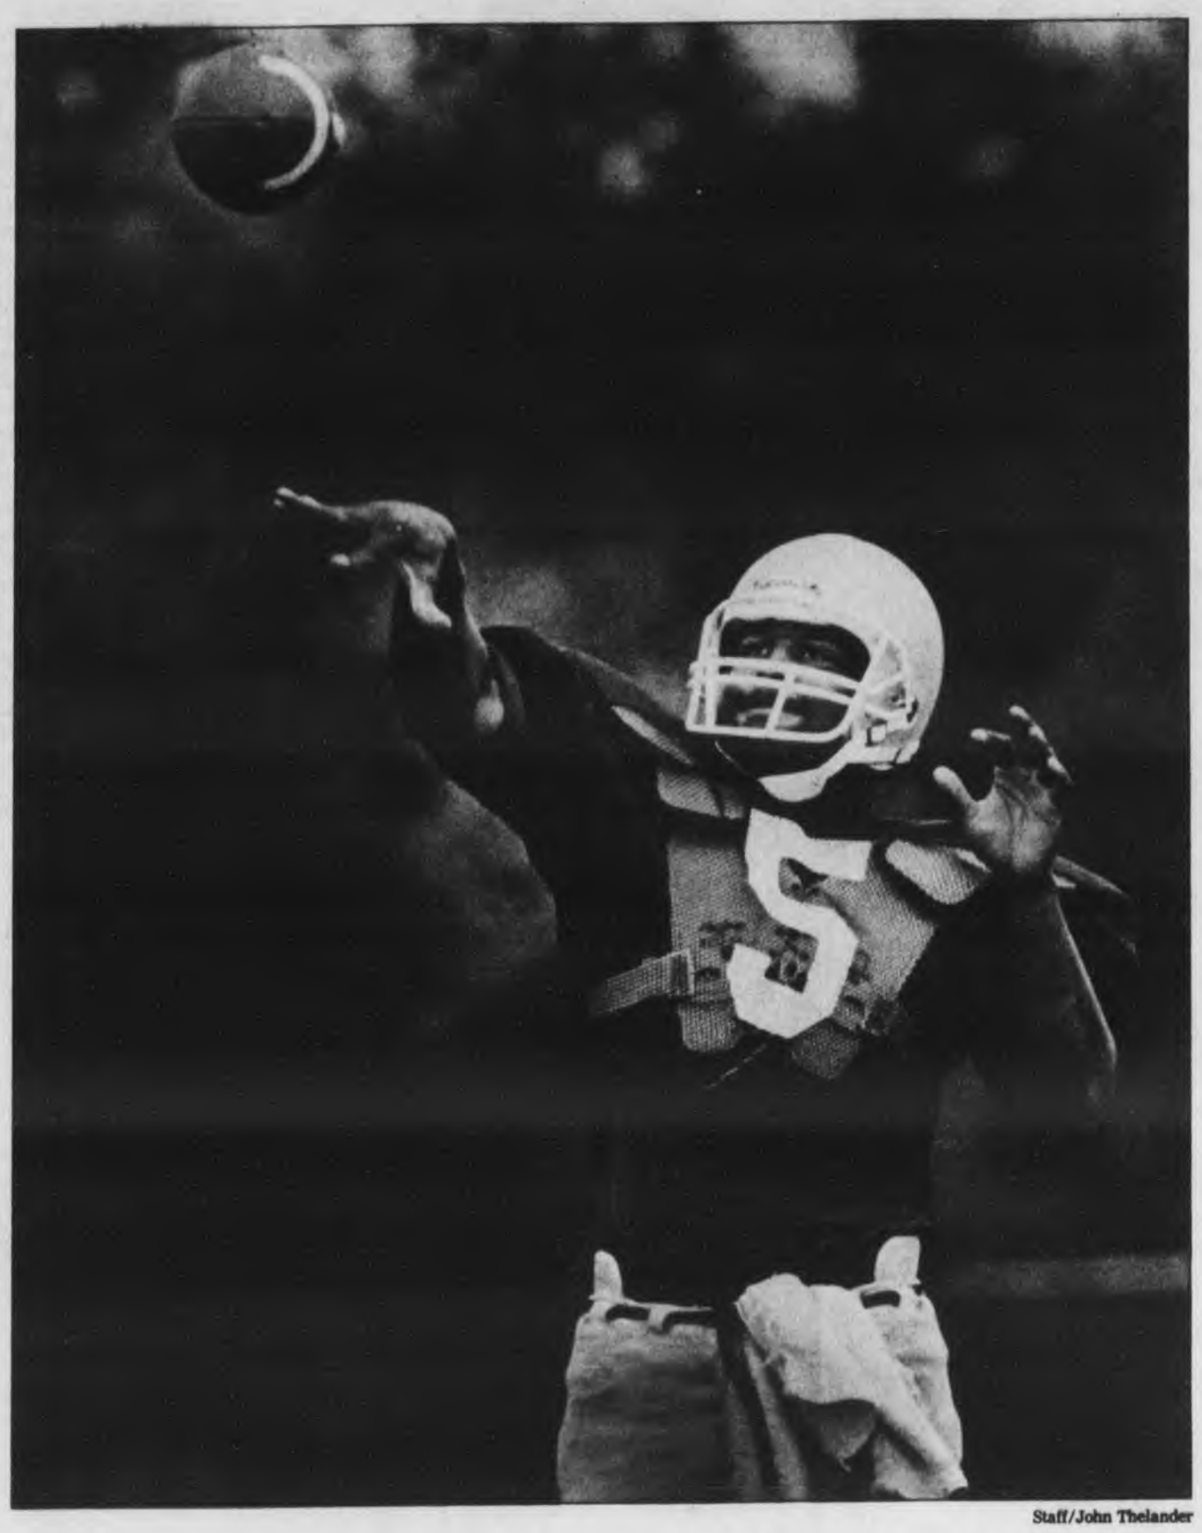
Welch, who led K-State to its only win last season over Missouri, appears to have the No. 2 spot nailed down, but is unsure what his role will be.

"I'm not sure where I'm going to fit in. I don't know where he's (Parrish) got me in his mind. I'm No. 2 right now and Randy's No. 1," Welch said. "My role is to stay constantly ready and on top of my game. I'll need to stay mentally tough while I'm No. 2 so if I get my opportunity, it will be productive."

Parrish appears to have plenty of confidence that Williams can get the job done.

"He's got good physical tools. When I was at Purdue (as an assistant coach in 1983), I had Scott Campbell and Jim Everett who are both in the pros now and I have had some other good quarterbacks, too. Randy has just as good of ball velocity as those people do," Parrish said. "A lot of it is in the system and the confidence comes with the system and throwing a thousand times a night and completing a high percentage of those."

Building Williams' confidence has been among Parrish's top priorities.



"Our biggest battle with Randy is that the people on the street don't think he can get it done," Parrish said. "That's why I have tried to insulate him somewhat and try to be a positive force. I have a lot of confidence that he's going to go out on the 30th and do a good job. Then suddenly it will be 'he wasn't such a bad quarterback after all.'"

In eight games last year, Williams completed just 63 of 151 passes for 615 yards and was intercepted 12 times.

"I learned a lot last season, taking those losses the way we did," Williams said. "Some of the mistakes I made last year, I don't think I'll ever make again."

Williams said he has had little problem adapting to Parrish's offensive system.

"When you learn the offense, you don't have to take the time to sit around and study the plays and everything," he said. "Football with Coach Parrish is really easy."

Car lease issue raises NU probe

By The Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. — Nebraska football coach Tom Osborne said Friday he is anxious to resolve questions raised about a car leased to Cornhusker I-back Doug DuBose.

DuBose and university officials were to attend a hearing before the NCAA Infractions Committee last weekend, but the NCAA postponed the session.

"We really felt bad that it wasn't taken care of Sunday," Osborne told the Big Eight Conference Skywriters. "We felt we had our case and we were ready to present it."

DuBose, a senior from Uncasville, Conn., rushed for more than 1,000 yards in both his sophomore and junior seasons. He was named to the All-Big Eight team both seasons.

Richard Wood, legal counsel to Chancellor Martin Massengale, told the Des Moines Register the university has completed its investigation into the DuBose case and believes no National Collegiate Athletic Association rules were violated.

Wood said he doesn't know when the NCAA will hold its hearing on the matter.

"We're trying to get it taken care of as soon as we can," Osborne said. "We're not delaying anything. We're full speed ahead."

Wood said the university has received a letter of inquiry from the NCAA that outlines 18 alleged rules violations.

Osborne said less than half of the alleged violations involve the football program and that none involve recruiting or any current members of the coaching staff.

Osborne also said the NCAA has already dropped some of the allegations.

DuBose leased a late-model sports car last September. NCAA and school officials haven't disclosed the nature of the alleged violation involving the car.

Florida interested in K-State's Travis

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Larry Travis, K-State athletic director, is a finalist for the University of Florida athletic director's job. Travis, along with five other current athletic directors and one head football coach, comprise the Gators final list of candidates released last week.

A screening committee originally selected six athletic directors and Louisiana State head football coach Bill Arnsparger. But John Swofford, athletic director at the University of North Carolina, has withdrawn his name from consideration.

Arnsparger met with Florida officials late last week to discuss the job. He said he was interested in the position, but wanted to get it cleared up quickly so it would not interfere with the football season. He said he would not accept the job, if selected, until after the upcoming season is completed. Bill Carr, the current athletic director, said earlier he would stay on as long as needed.

The screening committee also selected David Wagner of Georgia Southern, Cedric Warren Dempsey of University of Arizona, Fred Gruninger of Rutgers University, and Richard Young of Washington State University.

Travis, 45, is a 1963 graduate of Florida where he was an All-Southeastern Conference guard for the Gator football team. Travis also garnered third-team All-America honors and academic All-America status during his collegiate career at Florida.

In addition, Travis received his master's degree from Florida in 1969 during a coaching stint for the football team.

However, Travis did not formally apply for the job being vacated by Carr. He was nominated to the search committee early this summer by a group of prominent Florida alumni and boosters.

Travis also said he is not campaigning for the job, nor is he looking for another job. But, being his alma mater, he would sit down with the screening committee and discuss the situation with them if asked to do so, he said.

In his year and a half at K-State, Travis has raised the football recruiting budget from $110,000 to more than $200,000 and has begun a nationwide recruiting effort. He has had to oversee two sports being dropped from the current athletic department's budget and has been responsible for the hiring of every K-State men's coach currently on staff.

But, the two most important Travis decisions came with the hiring of Stan Parrish to guide the football team from the conference cellar and Lon Kruger, who was given the task of taking the Wildcat basketball team back into national prominence.

Hartman selected into Salukis' Hall of Fame

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Former K-State head basketball coach Jack Hartman will be one of seven people inducted into the Hall of Fame of Southern Illinois University in Carbondale.

Three women and four men who have figured prominently in SIU's sports history will be honored at a ceremony before the Salukis' first home game against Austin Peay State on Sept. 6.

Halftime ceremonies will feature Hall of Fame introductions and remarks. Plaques honoring Hall of Fame members hang in the south round floor corridor of the Student Center.

Hartman was the only coach selected to receive the award this year.

"I am very pleased to receive that honor. It brings back a lot of good memories," Hartman said.

After leaving Coffeyville Junior College, Hartman headed the SIU coaching staff from 1962 to 1970. In those eight seasons he coached the Salukis to 144 wins against 64 losses including a National Invitational Tournament championship title in 1967.

The national championship squad, recognized as the greatest in SIU history, finished 24-2 and featured eventual NBA standout Walt Frazier as the team leader.

"That was a very good team," Hartman said. "It's hard to compare teams, and I tend to shy away from that, but in this case I would have to say that squad was definitely one of the best I coached."

And Hartman said Frazier was one of the best ballplayers he has been in charge of.

"He was an exceptional player with exceptional physical skills, plus he had a very good understanding of the game. He was one of the best," he said.

Also entering the Salukis' Hall are basketball and track star Chuck Benson (1965-69), golfer Sandy Lemon (1976-80), trackster Sue Visconage (1975-79), diver Julia Warner (1977-81), the school's first black recruit in basketball Harvey Welch Jr. (1951-55) and Bob Roggy (1975-78).

Roggy, 29, died on Aug. 3 shortly after he fell out of the back of pickup truck in Houston. He had finished fifth in the javelin throw at the U.S. Olympic Festival meet the day before the accident. Roggy hurled the javelin 314-4 in 1982 which was the world's best toss that year.

Festival offers experience for K-State players

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Two members of the K-State volleyball team were among an elite few chosen to compete against the best players in the nation at the United States Olympic Festival this summer.

Junior Mary Kinsey and sophomore Shawnee Call were in Houston during the last week of July for the event.

Kinsey, from Evansville, Ind., played for the North team, which won the bronze medal. Call, who lives in Ellsworth, played for the West team, which finished fourth.

Kinsey and Call were chosen to the teams based upon impressive credentials from the past season.

Call finished among the top four in every major statistical category on the team last year. Kinsey, meanwhile, led the team in service aces and finished second in both kills and digs.

K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson, who coached one of the men's teams at the festival, explained the selection process.

The country was first divided into four geographical regions. After three tryout sessions, 12 players were chosen from each region. The coaches then took those 48 players and divided them back into four squads of 12, one for each region.

"It was a real honor having two players from Kansas State chosen," Nelson said.

He said the experience was extremely beneficial to both players.

Nelson said both women were classified as outside hitters, which he also referred to as one of the strengths of the K-State volleyball squad.

Nelson expects the experience to benefit both players.

Kinsey was thrilled with the news that she had been chosen to compete.

"I was really excited. I felt really honored," Kinsey said. "I just felt really grateful that I had been picked."

Kinsey pulled a muscle in her leg while her squad was practicing before the competition, and therefore saw limited action.

Despite the setback, Kinsey, who will be the captain of this year's team, said the experience was highly educational.

She said the best part of the festival for her was competing with and against players she had only read about or seen on TV prior to the competition.

She said despite the short time to practice together, there was a "real high level of play."

The reason for the quality of play, she said, was that while many of the good teams she faces during the regular collegiate season may have only two or three outstanding players, each of the teams participating had standouts at each position.

Milwuakee downs Royals with 11th-inning doubles

By The Associated Press

MILWAUKEE — Aggressiveness on the base paths is one of the traits that separates Milwaukee's Paul Molitor from the average player.

Molitor lined a hit into the right field corner in the 11th inning and never hesitated, stretching it into a double. That set up the winning run as Robin Yount followed with a double and gave the Brewers a 3-2 victory over the Kansas City Royals on Sunday.

Both Brewer hits in the 11th came off Kansas City reliever Dan Quisenberry, 1-5. The victory raised Milwaukee's record to 62-61, but the team remains in last place in the American League Eastern Division.

George Brett drove in both Kansas City runs with a double and a sacrifice fly, but Milwaukee tied it in the eighth.

Kansas City starter Dennis Leonard, who has not won since June 4, gave up six hits and three walks in 6⅔ innings and left leading 2-1. He struck out eight batters.

The Brewers scored an unearned run in the fifth inning. Rick Cerone singled, Molitor was safe on shortstop Salazar's fielding error and Robin Young singled home Cerone.

Clark named as coach of 'Cats' baseball team

By The Collegian Staff

Mike Clark was named as the new head baseball coach at K-State this summer, replacing former coach Gary Vaught who took a similar position at Oral Roberts University in June.

Clark's hiring completed a trio of new coaches brought in by Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to coach the three men's team sports.

Clark had been the head baseball coach at Northeastern Oklahoma A&M College for the past seven years. While there, he compiled a 293-136 coaching record, the best in the school's history.

A 1975 graduate of Missouri Western State College, Clark earned his bachelor of science degree in education. Clark also lettered three straight years as a pitcher after enrolling there as a sophomore.

Clark completed his master's degree in education at Northwest Missouri State University in 1977. Clark is married and has two children.

"We're pleased to have a man of Mike Clark's character and coaching ability come to Kansas State to hopefully guide our baseball team to national prominence," said Athletic Director Larry Travis.

"He has a great record, he's a great teacher, and we know that he'll continue to give our baseball program the type of commitment he has with others in the past," Travis said.

Wildcat coaches to host tryouts

Two K-State coaches will be sponsoring tryouts for those athletes interested in attempting to make their squads as walkons.

This afternoon at 3:30, volleyball coach Scott Nelson will be hosting tryouts in Ahearn Field House for all women interested in making the K-State volleyball team.

K-State golf coach Rob Sedorcek will have a meeting at 7:00 Wednesday night in room 204 in Ahearn for both men and women interested in competing on the K-State golf teams.

For more information on the tryouts, Nelson can be reached at 532-6910 and Sedorcek can be reached at 532-5723.

Missouri freshman requires surgery

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Tony VanZant, the University of Missouri freshman running back injured last month in a high school all-star game, underwent additional, extensive knee surgery Saturday.

VanZant, from the suburban St. Louis community of Hazelwood, had arthoscopic surgery on his left knee Aug. 12 to repair cartilage damage. Doctors at first thought additional surgery might not be necessary, but later decided they needed to do more extensive work on the knee.

Trainer Fred Wappel said Vanzant's knee will be immobolized for 4 weeks and full recovery from the surgery will take a year. Missouri had already announced plans to redshirt VanZant this season, and Wappel said the additional surgery means he will also have to miss next year's spring practice as well. He is expected to be ready to play for the Tigers next fall.

Leaders seek to merge 5.3 million in plan for creation of new church

By The Associated Press

Milwaukee is 332 miles from Minneapolis. Minneapolis is 405 miles from Chicago. Chicago is 87 miles from Milwaukee.

This week, three Lutheran denominations hold separate conventions in these Midwestern cities, with the aim of coming closer.

If all goes according to plan, they will meld their churches into a single Lutheran body of 5.3 million souls in 11,000 congregations nationwide.

The new church — the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America — would be America's fourth-largest Protestant denomination, behind the Southern Baptists, United Methodists and the National Baptist Convention.

Leaders of the three Lutheran churches say they have little doubt the merger will be approved when it comes to a vote Thursday. Results will be announced Friday.

"There are some differences of opinion that are important, but they are not going to hold up the new church," said Bishop James R. Crumley Jr., leader of the Lutheran Church in America, which is the largest of the three denominations with 2.9 million members. It is meeting in Milwaukee.

The other two churches are the 2.3 million-member American Lutheran Church, meeting in Minneapolis, and the 110,000-member Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches, which meets in Chicago.

Not all Lutheran churches will come together. The 2.6 million-member Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, the 400,000-member Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod and 10 smaller Lutheran groups totaling fewer than 100,000 members will keep their independence.

Leaders of the three churches that plan to unite acknowledge they have no real doctrinal differences. The denominations themselves are the product of more than 100 years of combinations and recombinations.

Once, there were as many as 60 Lutheran groups. There were Lutheran churches for Germans, Norwegians, Swedes, Danes, Finns and Dutch, with services in the languages of all those immigrants.

With assimilation, those differences faded. But the Lutherans remained fragmented, and Crumley said that has caused some problems.

"When you tell people you're a Lutheran, they ask you what brand," Crumley said. Merger would allow the Lutherans to give "a united witness," he said, and would ease ecumenical efforts with other Christian denominations.

But what difference would the average worshiper see in his congregation after the merger? "In the life of the congregation, I think it won't make a great deal of difference," Crumley said.

The new church is a result of four years of negotiations by a 70-member commission.

Some points of controversy remain, including the size of contributions to ministers' pension funds and racial and ethnic quotas for the church's decision-making groups.

The approval of the conventions would not complete the merger. Two-thirds of American Lutheran Church congregations must approve the agreement, along with a special convention of the Lutheran Church in America.

University gives welcome to new faculty, employees

By The Collegian Staff

Approximately 50 new K-State faculty and unclassified employees became acquainted with the University through a faculty orientation held last Thursday in the Union Big Eight Room.

The orientation began at 8:15 a.m. with a welcome and overview from President Jon Wefald and Provost Owen Koeppe.

Presentations on various aspects of the University were held throughout the morning to provide an introduction to K-State programs, give profiles of K-State students and explain benefits and other aspects of interest to faculty, said Koeppe.

"We have this orientation every fall as a part of a plan to make new people feel as welcome as possible. I think it helps them to know someone cares," he said.

"Previously the orientation was a daylong event, but we found it was too lengthy and shortened it to its current format of half a day," Koeppe said.

Laverne Lindsey, assistant provost and cordinator for this year's orientation, said the program went very well, with most of the faculty staying the entire time.

Koeppe said that although the orientation was attended mostly by new faculty, anyone hired by the University since December 1985 were invited to attend.

Lindsey said the focus was on the pride in the undergraduate teaching program.

"A good deal of time was devoted to data on students here at K-State — we gave a lot of statistical information including grade point averages, high schools and demographic regions where K-State students come from," Lindsey said.

"Time was also spent discussing the behavior of K-State students and how this behavior is affected when students experience shifts of career or major interests."

Faculty were also made aware of various student services and how to implement good advisement.

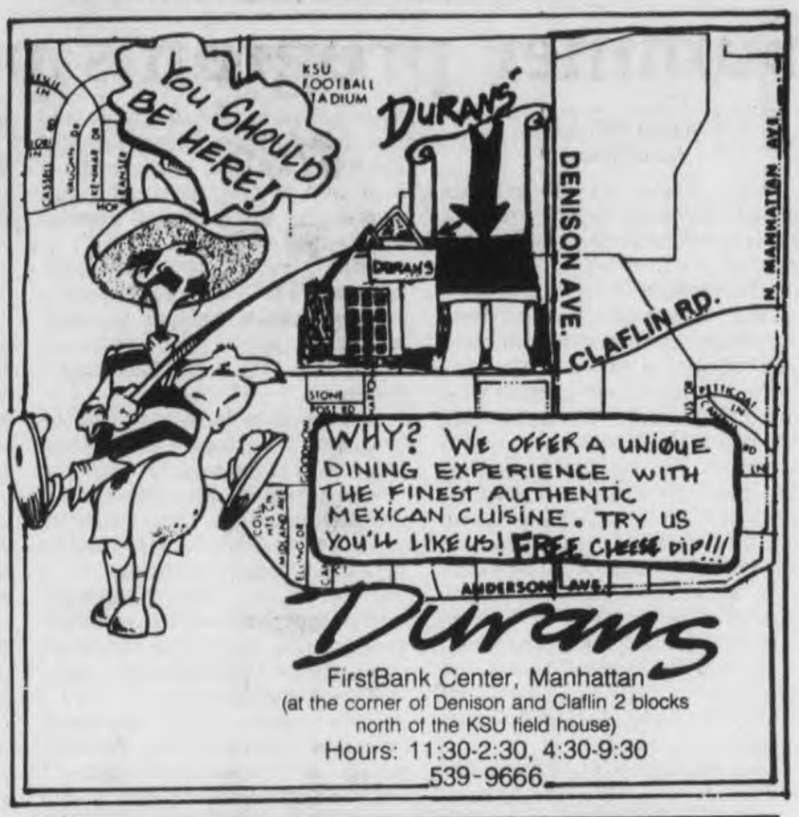
Hormel negotiations persist; officials expect settlement

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Contract settlements for seven Hormal plants are not expected this weekend as previously hoped, but a company official said he was optimistic an agreement would be reached Monday.

"There is no breakthrough yet, but we're still optimistic," said Charles Nyberg, senior vice president for George A. Hormel Co.

Nyberg said Sunday afternoon that the two sides had been in negotiations since early morning.



"It'll go into this evening if we don't get it resolved before then," he said. "There is a chance we'll see something yet tonight, but we're talking about some hard issues. These negotiations have been going on better than 18 months."

Company and union officials have agreed not to release details about the negotiations, Nyberg said. "We'd just as soon get it wrapped up before we start talking about the particulars."

Negotiators for Hormel and the United Food and Commercial Workers union have been meeting in Des moines, Iowa, since Wednesday night.

About 1,400 meatpackers at Hormel's flagship plant in Austin went on strike a year ago in a dispute over wages and working conditions. The plant has since resumed full production with replacement workers and union members who returned to work.

The talks also involve plants in Fremont, Neb.; Beloit, Wis.; Algona, Iowa; Dallas, Houston and Atlanta. Contracts at those plants expire Sept. 1.

Summer programs provide enrichment

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

While summer provides a break for some students, activities ranging from classes for kindergarteners to a program for people over 60 are offered at the University.

About 50 workshops in all were taught this summer at the University. A majority of the workshops were credit and non-credit programs for high school students that lasted from two days to five weeks.

Students in kindergarten through sixth grade participated in Summer Adventure '86, an all-day program that combined physical fitness and enrichment classes to complement what the children learn in school. Four two-week sessions of the program lasted throughout the summer.

"It gives the kids an exposure to enrichment activities that would not be found otherwise," said Bill Butler, director of the program.

Some enrichment classes popular with the students were judo, science, theater, music, Indian culture and computers. Fitness classes included individual and team sports, rythmic skills and dancing, body and fitness awareness, aerobics and exercise and swimming.

"The program is also unique because the children attended classes in many campus buildings and some ate at the cafeteria," Butler said. "It was just like going to college."

Butler said he hopes to expand the program to include middle-school students next summer.

The program for high school students gave them the opportunity to get a taste of what it is like to live on campus and go to college.

One of the more than 20 programs offered was Engineering and Summer Science Institute, a non-credit class, taught by John Dollar, assistant dean of engineering.

"This program gets the students on campus where they can see what people do in various fields of engineering, math, chemistry and physics," Dollar said.

Other programs focused on different fields of interest that high school students might be considering.

Workshops were also offered for graduate students and professionals throughout the summer.

Undergraduate and graduate biology students from 21 states and seven countries attended the Rapid Methods and Automation in Microbiology conference to learn and see the newest technology in microbiology.

"Twenty companies came to the campus to demonstrate new technology and products in the field of microbiology," said David Fong, program instructor.

The largest professional meeting on campus was the American Society of Animal Science which drew 2,300 participants in late July.

"The meeting impacted on various facets of animal science," said John Havlicek, assistant director of conferences in Continuing Education.

Other activities during the annual meeting included professional paper presentations and field trips to local areas of interest.

Elderhostel, a weeklong program for people over 60, offered three different classes daily. Elderhostel has 850 programs nationwide and in Europe this year.

"Guided tours were included in the program to places that are unique to Manhattan like the Konza Prairie and the American Institute of Baking," said Pam Evans, coordinator of the program for the past three years.

Hostelships, scholarships for low-income elderly, were given to four people.

Evans said half of the 24 people who attended were University alumni.

"I think some of them came back to see what the University was like since they have graduated," she said.

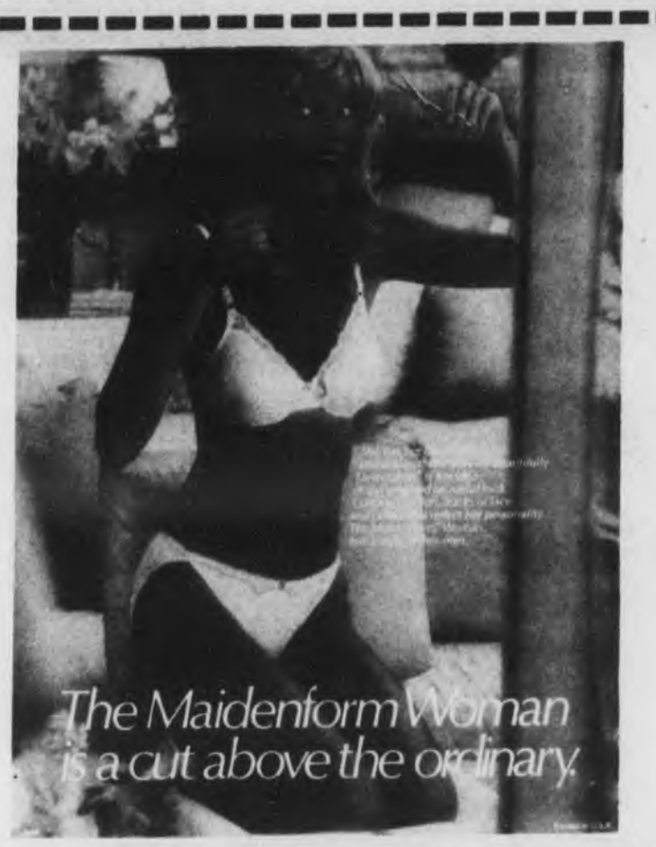
Commissioners OK budget for fiscal '87

By The Collegian Staff

At their Aug. 19 meeting, Manhattan city commissioners adopted a 1987 budget of $21.1 million, 5 percent higher than the revised 1986 budget.

According to figures provided by the City Accounting Department, a 2.271 net increase in the mill levy is responsible for the increase. This increase brings the estimated mill rate for the 1987 budget to 35.462 mills.

A mill is calculated as $1 per $1,000 of assessed property. On property assessed at $50,000 the increase in the mill levy would be about $115.



The mill rate for 1987 is about the same as it was in 1979 when the rate was at 34.670 mills, said Curt Wood, director of finance.

Following a half-cent increase in the sales tax in 1982, the mill rate declined. However, this year's increase is the third within the last three years.

Also, passage of the Quality of Life Bond Issue affected the budget. It allowed the city to remove $150,000 budgeted for the planned sports complex in west Manhattan, and spread it over the life of the bonds, Wood said.

The city came a long way from the original budget first assembled in April which asked for an increase of 12.5 mills, he said.

"It was a tremendous feat because the city lost $500,000 in revenue sharing and added $150,000 to social services," Wood said.

Crime victims receive assistance from program providing support

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Sometimes the suffering endured by a crime victim does not end with the crime itself.

Victims of crimes need reassurance and support to help eliminate the stress that can be experienced in the criminal justice system during an investigation, said Kris Kelderman, victim assistance coordinator for Riley County Community Corrections.

"Many times the victims have problems because they do not understand the system. It is part of my job to help them understand the process followed in an investigation," she said.

"I am here to help anyone who would like assistance," Kelderman said. "I try to be a liaison to the law enforcement. A lot of my job is explaining how the system works."

Frank McCoy, director of RCCC, said the Victims Assistance Unit, which concentrates on offering help to victims of personal crimes, was formed in July 1982 in conjunction with RCCC.

McCoy said that in 1978 Kansas passed the Community Corrections Act which allowed counties to form these programs which are funded by the state and work in conjunction with the state department of corrections. Kelderman said RCCC works with the courts and closely monitors first-time felony offenders.

ROCC has a total staff of eight, McCoy said. He added that the VAU alone handles about 2,000 victims per year through various methods, which includes sending letters offering assistance to victims of crimes.

The goals of the VAU, according to RCCC are: to provide victim services as soon as possible after the time of victimization; to aid in public awareness of services offered throughout the community; to supply supportive services for victims of personal crimes in advocating these victims in the criminal justice system; and to educate the community on issues involving the needs of crime victims in general.

Kelderman said the biggest benefit provided by the unit is the support given to the victims.

"People feel they have a voice and support system," she said. "They are not just a number. They feel less violated."

Kelderman said the Riley County Police Department is cooperative with the VAU.

"It is wonderful because we are able to be right there with the investigation," she said.

Kelderman said many times assistance units are unable to obtain complete cooperation with a police department, which can put restraints on the unit's ability to help victims.

Kelderman said she has visited with many of the fraternities and sororities on campus offering them information on sexual assault.

Kelderman described "Happy Bear," one of the community education programs offered by the unit. The program, which began in May 1985, is designed to educate children from kindergarten through second grade on the three R's of sexual assault, Kelderman said.

The three R's the unit attempts to teach are: the ability to recognize sexual assault, the right to resist the assault and the need to report the assault to someone.

"This program has been very beneficial to investigations. Children are able to identify their private parts, and they can distinguish between a good and bad touch. If they have to talk to investigators, it is not so frightening and scary for the children that have seen the skit."

Kelderman said new laws that provide for videotaping the testimonies of children age 13 and under will reduce the trauma of the situation.

Kelderman said many times she recommends counseling for the victims which Pawnee Mental Health and the Family Center at K-State share a large part.

Fearful residents discuss plan to combat 'Westport Rapist'

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Westport Rapist, a nickname given to a man police say has stalked and raped 15 women since October, has left residents of the midtown area afraid and angry, but also brought neighbors closer together.

"I've had friends and neighbors raped," said Martha Hamblen, a resident of the Westport area who organized a meeting attended by 200 people last week to discuss the rapist and methods of defense. "Everyone has heard the line from the movie 'Network': 'I'm fed up, and I'm not going to take it anymore.' We're fed up, we're angry and we're scared."

The rapes have changed the lifestyles of residents of the Westport and Plaza neighborhoods. Porch lights stay on later and children who play ball in the streets go inside earlier. Women have bought thousands of dollars worth of security devices, and people have made the point of meeting their neighbors.

"It's brought most of the neighbors closer together," said Dan Hoxworth, president of the West Plaza Neighborhood Association. "To protect themselves and stop this activity and other criminal activity, they have to band together."

Police believe the suspect is a slim and muscular light-skinned black, between 5-foot-5 and 6-foot and weighing 135 to 180 pounds. He frequently wears a mask.

The man watches his victims until he knows the comings and goings in their homes, said Capt. Marylyn Brauninger, commander of the Police Department's sex crimes unit.

Police have told residents to pin their windows, lock doors, light their driveways and form neighborhood block watches.

Farm Bureau plans relocation

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

With rezoning and annexation procedures completed, Kansas Farm Bureau is moving forward with construction plans for a new headquarters.

Chief City Planner Larry Hulse said the annexation of about 45 acres northwest of Manhattan, along Seth Child's Road, made it possible for the land to be rezoned from agricultural to I-5, business and park district zoning. The annexation was approved by the Manhattan City Commission Aug. 5.

The annexed land is located directly north of the organization's original relocation site, which was also north of Stonehenge Drive. The new site is directly west of Master Teacher, Inc., on Leadership Lane, east of Seth Child's Road.

Chuck Waggoner, real estate and mortgage loan manager for KFB, said the new relocation site was chosen for its better visibility and base for construction footings. He also noted the new site contains more wooded area and a pond, which will probably be implemented into the new facility's design.

The previous relocation site, made up of about 25 acres, was flat, cleared farmland.

Local architect for the facility, with an estimated total cost between $10 million and $13 million, is Brent Bowman & Associates, working in conjunction with the Wichita firm of Shaefer, Johnson, Cox, Frey and Associates. The new headquarters is to contain approximately 200,000 square feet of office space.

Although no date has been set for the start of construction, completion date has been set for January 1989.

Waggoner said the facility's schematic drawings have been completed, but final architectural drawings are "quite a ways off."

He said relocation from KFB's present headquarters, located at 2321 Anderson Ave., was made necessary by the organization's outgrowing its current site, consisting of between six and seven acres.

Robert Larson, vice president/investments manager for KFB, said the Anderson Avenue facility has approximately 117,000 square feet, housing approximately 470 employees.

The current structure was built in three phases, beginning in 1954, with the first addition constructed in 1957, he said. The tower and top four floors were completed in 1971.

The expansion in structural size will not necessarily mean an increase in services, Waggoner said, but will allow Farm Bureau's accounting and tax services to be in the same facility. Those operations are currently housed in the Waters Professional Building on Waters Street.

Priest's attorneys seek to restrain activities of South African police

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A court affidavit, quoted in a Sunday newspaper, said a black priest who was held in detention for 10 weeks was forced to stand blindfolded for 20 hours last week during interrogation.

It said he later had trouble walking.

The priest was identified as the Rev. Smangoliso Mkhatshwa, general secretary of the Southern African Catholic Bishops Conference. He has been in detention since June 12, when a nationwide state of emergency was decreed.

The decree allows authorities to detain people without charge. The government told Parliament last Monday that it was holding 8,501 people under the state of emergency. Some detainees have been released since.

A Pretoria Supreme Court was scheduled to hear testimony Monday from two doctors who examined Mkhatshwa on Friday.

The priest's attorneys asked the court to restrain police from what they said would be further assaulting or torturing of their client, said City Press, a newspaper for Johannesburg's black community.

Oxfam, a British humanitarian agency, said it had received reports from church contacts in South Africa about Mkhatshwa's being tortured, and sent a telex Saturday to British Ambassador Dennis Worrall, asking him to intervene.

Mkhatshwa's secretary, Sister Cecilia Smit, visited him Thursday night at his cell at the Hercules police station in Pretoria, a day after his interrogation, according to her affidavit quoted by City Press.

"As he climbed up two steps...I noticed he was experiencing difficulty standing up straight and walking," she said in her affidavit. "He had a stick in one hand and was using it to assist him in staying on his feet."

The priest's attorney, Brian Currin, said in his affidavit that when he saw Mkhatshwa on Tuesday, the day before the alleged torture, the priest was in good health and "he certainly had no difficulty walking."

Taiwan stifles industrial counterfeiters

Imitation marketeers being controlled

By The Associated Press

TAIPEI, Taiwan — Enterprising Taiwan, the "king of knock-offs," is mending its copycat ways, passing laws and locking up business people who counterfeit toys, computers and other brand-name big sellers on the world market.

But a stroll through Taipei shows the crackdown has only begun.

In the Snake Alley night market, "Rolex," "Cartier" and other fake top-line watches are still on sale. Elsewhere, pirated copies of American computer software go for just $10 or $15. A popular local soft drink, meanwhile, is sold in Coca-Cola look-alike cans. And on Taiwan television commercials make free use of copyrighted U.S. music.

"The enforcement process is slow," Roger D. Severance, Pacific Basin specialist for the U.S. Commerce Department, said in a Washington interview. "...We're trying to change the way a fairly significant part of business has been run in Taiwan."

The Reagan administration says U.S. industry loses up to $20 billion a year to industrial counterfeiters worldwide.

In the early 1980s, the U.S. International Trade Commission estimated 60 percent of the knock-offs were made in Taiwan. Although some dismiss that estimate as too high, American authorities have long identified this subtropical island of cheap labor and family-run factories as the biggest international source of unauthorized industrial copies.

Taiwanese officials say the counterfeiting trade developed because the island's rapid economic growth outstripped an antiquated legal system in which patents, trademarks and copyrights had little place. And while productive capacity boomed, Taiwan's design, research and marketing abilities lagged.

"Taiwan companies didn't have the money to do the design," Lee Tahai, Taiwan's economic affairs minister, told a reporter. Consequently, the companies copied the designs of others.

The blame is not all one-sided. Explained Jeffrey R. Harris, Taipei manager of Hong Kong-based Commercial Trademark Services, which tracks down trademark and patent violators:

"The typical Taiwanese involved owns a middle-size factory, say a plastics factory making toys. Don't tell me he's going to go to the States looking for trends, and then line up 200 stores there as outlets. It's done by Americans, thousands of guys coming in here placing orders, guys who know what they need and where they can sell it."

The counterfeiters often work off fads, making "Gremlins" or "E.T." toys and clothes, for example — spin-offs from popular movies or children's TV shows that they then ship off quickly to the United States.

In other cases, Taiwanese plants churn out fragrances approximating such heavily advertised perfumes as Chanel, or produce "Lee" or "Levi" blue jeans for sale in Third World markets.

Harris said his firm was hired by a jeans manufacturer whose Middle East market was being ruined by counterfeiters. His investigators traced the illicit denim copies to 45 small Taiwanese enterprises, each of which made part of the garment and sent it to three exporters that assembled and shipped the product.

"They steamroll counterfeit computers, but you still can go out around Taipei and buy them," complained one U.S. trade specialist here.

New tax law alters intervention policy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The landmark tax-overhaul legislation Congress is expected to approve later this year represents a step away from the use of the federal tax code as a means to shape or modify the public's economic behavior.

Decades of good intentions — tax provisions aimed at social goals ranging from the promotion of home ownership to the conservation of energy — have produced a confusing federal tax code and millions of taxpayers who are bitter and suspicious about the government.

Supporters of the legislation say one of their main objectives is to let people make their own decisions and do things because they make economic sense and not simply because they make for lower taxes.

At the end of a marathon day of talks, when congressional negotiators were about to approve the new legislation, Sen. Bill Bradley, D-N.J., said, "This is not just about the economy."

Bradley cited a 1982 survey that asked if people thought they would get ahead by abiding by the rules.

"Over 80 percent of those who responded said no. ...Well, I think that what we're saying tonight is we're going to do our part to make sure that that question is never asked again, that they won't be referring to the tax rules. And the result will be greater trust in government and a strengthened democracy," Bradley said.

It had become common to enact tax provisions to achieve a result by affecting the way people do things. The idea was that the government would give up some revenue to achieve a specific purpose.

The provisions could be narrow or broad, helping one industry or the public at large.

For example, around the turn of the century there was a federal levy of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine colored yellow to resemble butter. But the tax, aimed at cutting the competition to butter, was only one-quarter of a cent per pound on the uncolored, and less appetizing, oleo.

Some provisions had more impact, such as the move to encourage home ownership by allowing a deduction for the interest paid on home mortgages.

"Use of the tax code to induce different kinds of behavior has been tried for years. It doesn't work," said Joseph Minarik of the Washington-based Urban Institute, a public-policy research organization.

"It's wasteful because you create an inducement for people to do one particular thing and lots of people attempt to squeeze under the umbrella by doing something slightly different ...so they can get the benefit," said Minarik, a former congressional aide who specialized in tax issues.

"The government tried to encourage the development of real estate and now we're overwhelmed by empty office buildings," Minarik said. The attempt to make banks stable through granting tax breaks ended up so that "now some don't pay any taxes at all."

Campaign could harm ministry, Falwell says

By The Associated Press

LYNCHBURG, Va. — The Rev. Jerry Falwell says that despite Pat Robertson's effort to emphasize his experience in law and business, he cannot escape identification as a minister if he runs for president.

And Falwell, the Baptist minister who founded the Moral Majority, says he is concerned that a Robertson presidential campaign could be harmful to "the evangelical cause at large."

"Pat, we're not against you running," Falwell said he would advise Robertson, an evangelical Christian who has all but declared his candidacy for the Republican nomination. He said he would tell Robertson: "We like you, believe in you, but be very careful because just as Jerry Falwell can hurt us all, you can hurt us more now that you are running for president."

Falwell, a leader of the religious right who shares many of Robertson's political beliefs, discussed politics during an interview in a small, spare office at Liberty University, the institution he founded 15 years ago.

He has already declared his support of Vice President George Bush for the 1988 Republican presidential nomination.

Falwell has a stock response when asked about a Robertson candidacy: "I think Pat Robertson would make an excellent president. I just think George Bush would make a better one."

He repeated that statement on this occasion. Falwell said he and the Rev. Billy Graham had discussed Robertson in a telephone conversation.

"He thinks a great deal of Pat Robertson, as I do," Falwell said. "...We were just sharing that hopefully his running for president will not hurt him or his ministry or the evangelical cause at large."

Robertson concedes there is, what he calls "an antipathy against the involvement of the clergy in politics."

At a meeting with reporters recently, Robertson said he would answer that issue by emphasizing that he has a law degree, attended the London School of Economics and runs the mutli-million-dollar Christian Broadcasting Network. "That isn't your typical parish priest," he said.

Robertson has complained that during the contest for precinct delegates in the Michigan Republican primary, Bush supporters circulated a flyer headlined, "Help Keep Religion Out of Politics."

"I don't think George Bush had anything to do with that," Falwell said.

He said supporters of the religious right also have been guilty of excesses, pointing to the Michigan primary campaign of Rep. Mark Siljander.

The congressman, a strong supporter of the religious right, was defeated by a Republican challenger. Siljander attributed his defeat to backlash from a tape distributed to ministers in which he asked for their help to "break the back of Satan."

Sunken pirate ship may yield millions

By The Associated Press

CHATHAM, Mass. — The hundreds of silver coins, pieces of gold and silver bars stashed in a bank vault here more than equal the lifetime's work of many treasure hunters.

But it's just a fraction of the pirate's booty that Barry Clifford believes is still buried in the sea bottom off Cape Cod where pirate Samuel "Black" Bellamy's flagship, the Whydah, sank in a storm 269 years ago.

"We're probably going to hit the big stuff this year," he said recently, estimating the Spanish pieces of eight and other coins already taken from the wreck are worth more than $12 million.

The Whydah, an English slave ship, was on its maiden voyage from Africa in 1716 when it was seized by Bellamy in the Caribbean. Bellamy went on to plunder dozens of other ships before the galleon went down in 1717 in a violent storm off Cape Cod.

An Indian guide and a shipwright who had been taken prisoner by Bellamy were the only survivors among the estimated 180 to 210 crew members and prisoners aboard the Whydah.

The shipwright, along with seven men who survived the wreck of a sister pirate ship in the storm, were tried in Boston, where musty court records show six were hanged for piracy, according to Arthur T. Vanderbilt II, who has written a history of the Whydah.

The Whydah and its wealth became a legend.

"When I was a boy living on the Cape I heard about Bellamy and the Whydah," recalled Clifford, 40, a professional salvor. He discovered what he thought was the Whydah in November 1982, using powerful metal detectors and historical records as a guide to the site some 700 yards off shore in Wellfleet.

At a depth of 30 feet and under more than 10 feet of shifting sand, Clifford and his divers found seven cannons, navigational instruments, pottery and other items in addition to the coins and bars of precious metals.

Many were skeptical that Clifford had found the pirate galleon until October 1985 when he found a ship's bell inscribed "The Whydah Gally 1716." The Whydah's wreckage fans out over 100,000 square feet, he said.

The survivors of the shipwreck testified in the Boston trial that the ship carried 30,000 pounds of silver, 10,000 pounds of gold and 20 tons of ivory and jewels. Clifford said estimates of the total value of the treasure range up to $400 million.

Much of the treasure will eventually be sold, Clifford said. In the meantime, his company, Maritime Explorations, has raised $4 million through a limited partnership to help pay for the salvage, which could take years.

Clifford has been embroiled in a legal tangle with Massachusetts over who owns the treasure.

Under state law, officials can supervise the salvaging of any wreck within the three-mile off-shore zone under state jurisdiction. The law also entitles the state to one-quarter of the profits from any salvage operation.

Clifford is challenging the law in court.

He says his ultimate goal is to set up ,a museum to display the Whydah's remains and to provide what he believes is a less distorted history of piracy.

"The pirates were only villains to the shipping industry," said Clifford, a former high school history teacher.

Pirates, he contends, actually were the emancipators of many sailors who were impressed into service on sometimes trumped-up charges of being vagrants or drunks.

Pirate society, he said, emphasized equally sharing the loot from ships' raids. It also emphasized democracy: Pirate captains were elected by their crew and decisions were made by a majority vote, he said.

Fire ravages forest in France

By The Associated Press

NICE, France — Walls of fire driven by high winds ravaged thousands of acres of forest and vacation land on the Cote d'Azur Sunday, leaving two people dead and about 100 people injured, most suffering from smoke inhalation.

Four firemen were injured, one seriously, officials at the crisis center reported, and more than 2,000 people were evacuated from villages, camping grounds and a psychiatric clinic.

They said about 40 homes and cabins and more than a dozen vehicles were consumed by the flames, and two villages, Auribeau and Pegomas, were 80 percent burned out.

The fires started Saturday afternoon and by Sunday night had raced through more than 17,000 acres, the officials reported. The glow of flames penetrated the smoke-filled sky along the southeastern coast.

Late Sunday there was no indication that hundreds of firefighters had managed to slow the onrushing flames.

Security Minister Robert Pandraud flew over the burned out areas that extend from Tanneron, in the Var region, east to the resort towns of Grasse and Mandelieu.

The charred body of a woman was found Sunday night in Luceram, north of Nice, where a new fire was growing, police reported. They said a 60-year-old farmer in Tanneron died of a heart attack as he was dousing his home with water to protect it from the flames encircling the town.

Most of the people who suffered smoke inhalation were treated at the scene by first-aid teams.

"It's the first time in 27 years that I'm witnessing such a rapidly spreading fire," said one rescue official at Tanneron. "I saw flames leap 300 meters (yards) between two peaks. It's impossible to stop these tongues of fire which join each other and form a front pushed by the wind."

The famed "Mistral" — Mediterranean wind — was measured at 50 mph at one point, crisis center officials reported. They said it pushed the flames from Tanneron eastward Saturday night, but late Sunday evening was turning them west to the Var region.

K-State gives most in 1985 blood drive

By The Collegian Staff

The Wichita Region of the American Red Cross received the largest donation of blood in its history during the 1985 fiscal year, and K-State was its largest contributor.

The University, part of the 101-county region covering Kansas and Northwest Oklahoma, donated more than 3,000 of the 95,856 total units of blood collected, said Linda Frey, executive director of the Manhattan Red Cross, 411 N. Third St.

"K-State is the largest contributor in our region," Frey said. "It is a critical part of the region."

It also ranks first in blood donations among Big Eight schools.

During the blood drive, Frey said, Wichita sends all of its equipment and personnel to the campus. No other donations are taken during the University drive, she said.

This year volunteers can donate blood at the campus drive scheduled for Oct. 21-24.

Another record set by the region is a red cell "outdate" of 0.5 percent.

Describing the cell outdate, Frey said blood components such as red cells have shelf lives, similar to perishable foods. If there is an oversupply of blood, the unused portions "spoil."

In the last fiscal year, only 0.5 percent of the blood was not distributed.

"That's just astonishing when you think of it," Frey said.

Frey said the idea of cell outdate is related to the supply side theory of economics.

"Very seldom do we have more supply than demand," she said.

The number of blood units donated is between 350 and 360 each day, she said.

Four components can be derived from one unit of blood, red blood cells, for use during surgery; platelet concentrates, for bleeding disorders; serum albumin, used for accident victims; and gamma globulins, for combating infectious diseases.

"Every unit of blood can be divided in four ways," she said. "So every donor has the possibility of helping four people."

Koeppe quits provost post

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Provost Owen Koeppe announced his resignation Monday, effective June 30, 1987, in order to remain in his position until the end of the current academic year.

Koeppe, who has served as the University's provost since August 1980, said he attributes his resignation to his frustration with recent budget cuts.

Koeppe said he has occupied similar provost positions for 14 years and said he is tired of handling the responsibility of making budget cuts.

"Budget cutting is no fun. It is agonizing work, especially to tell a dean that we are going to cut his budget by so many thousand dollars. It was a hard, tough year," Koeppe said.

"If the current system holds, there will be a $1 million budget cut effective July 1, 1987. This was determined by this year's enrollment...if we stick to the same system nothing will change this."

Koeppe said the Legislature is the only body with the authority to change the present system.

Koeppe said although he would be interested in other types of administrative positions, he has no desire to seek a provost position at another institution.

"I'm tired of the tough budget decisions that higher education is looking at today."

Koeppe said he believes budget decisions are not easy at any institution of higher education. However, he said it may not be "necessarily as bad" at other institutions.

Koeppe said he was not unhappy with the old or new administrations and added, "a new administration needs time and new changes are expected."

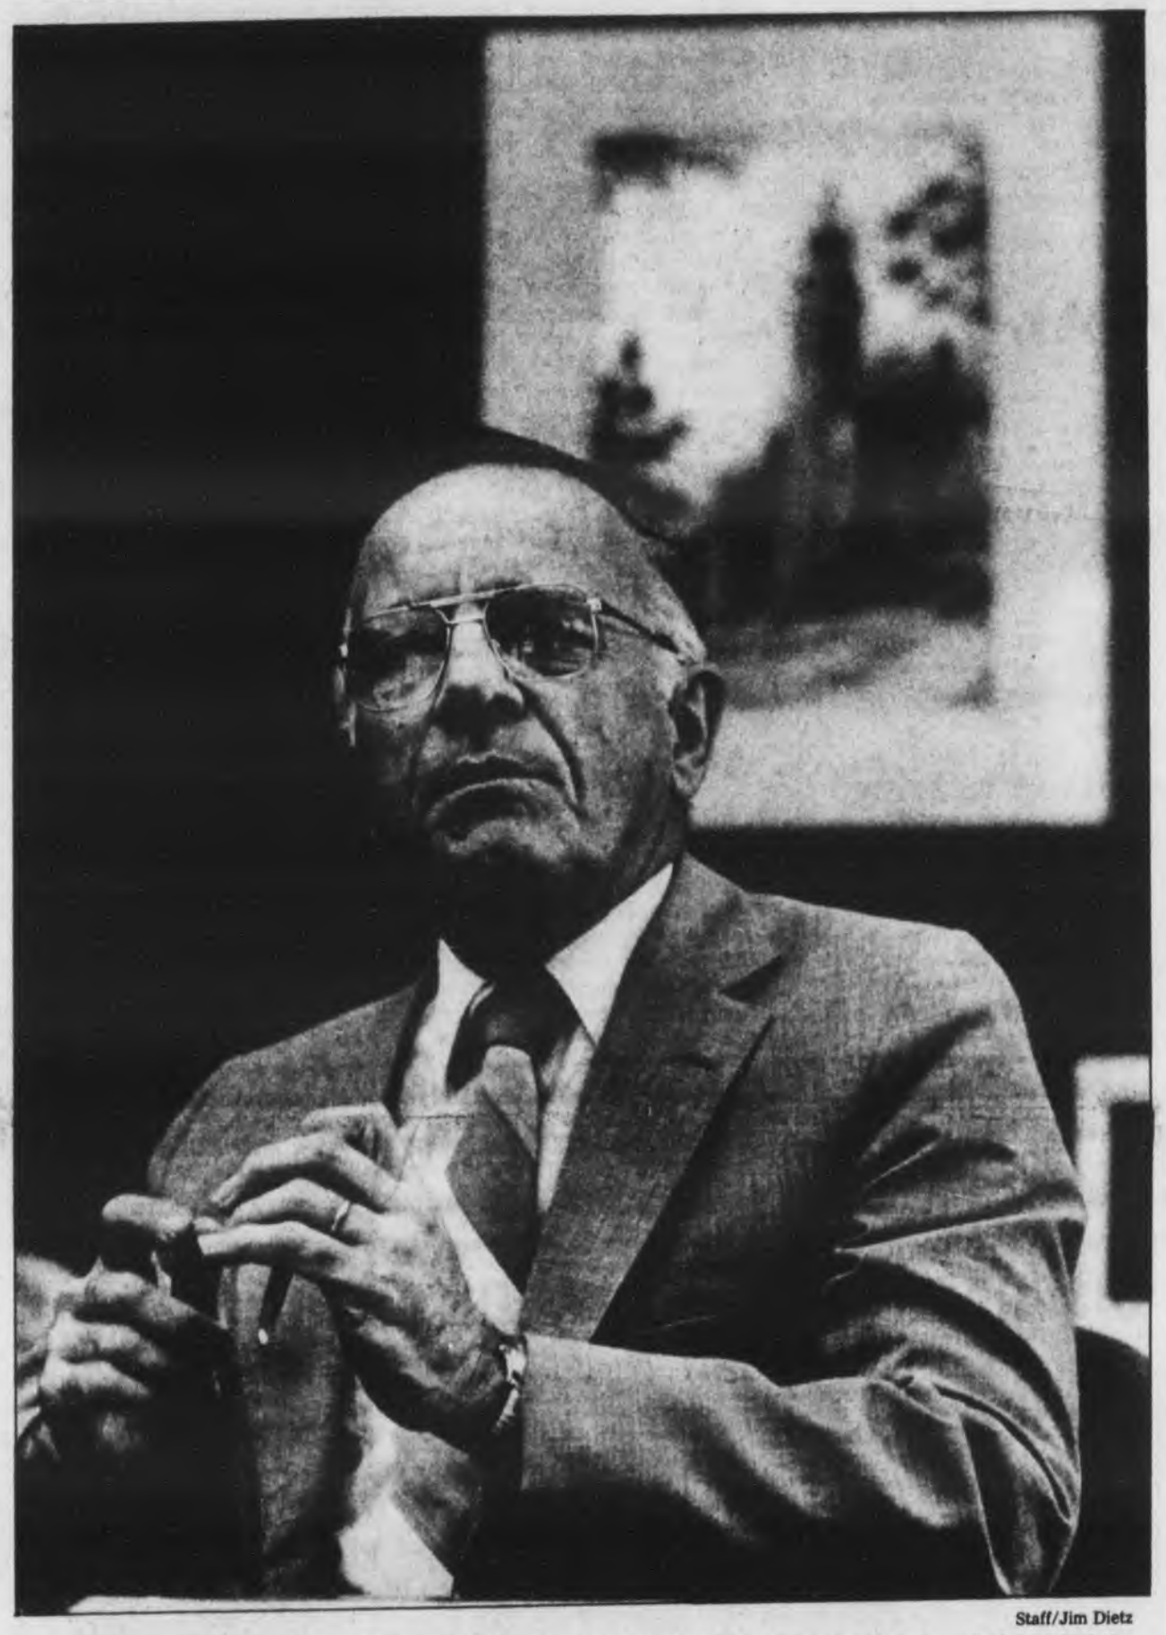
"My resignation had nothing to do with displeasure with the administrations. I am happy to say I have been working with quality people.

"One can never agree with all the members of an administration. I did express my views. Whatever the decision, I was still part of the team and supported the decisions that were made. I have always been blessed with working with people who were willing to hear differences of opinion."

Koeppe said it is important that a member of an administration not disagree publicly with the administrative decisions. He said if it came to this, the member should leave. However, he emphasized that this was not the reason for his resignation.

When asked who initiated his resignation, Koeppe said, "Of course, I discussed it with both Presidents (Duane) Acker and (Jon) Wefald. Because of the reorganization involved, they had a say in the timing. Dr. Wefald considered it the appropriate time. ...Wefald considered it best if I stayed through the current year, because they will need the better part of a year to find a replacement."

Immediately after completing his term as provost, Koeppe said, he will begin teaching in the Department of Biochemistry and the Center for Science Education .



"I have been very happy at K-State. However, the agony of cutting budgets has made me less than totally happy," he said.

Koeppe came to K-State from the University of Missouri, Columbia, and says he does not regret the move.

Koeppe said he never thought he would leave Missouri and added, "The people (at K-State) turned me on. I haven't been disappointed. The attitude is very upbeat. I will have a little more of a chance to interact with the students now, which is what I enjoy."

Koeppe said of his position during the present academic year, "I will

Provost Owen Koeppe submitted his resignation Monday but he will continue in the job until the end of the academic year. Koeppe, provost since 1980, attributes his resignation to pressures from making budget cuts.

Enrollment at K-State stabilizes

By The Collegian Staff

K-State enrollment declined only slightly this semester signaling a stabilization in the number of students attending the University, officials announced Monday.

Preliminary figures released showed 14,316 students registering, a decline of 68 students from the fall 1985 total of 14,384, Registrar Don Foster said.

The enrollment process continues until Sept. 22 when night classes and off-campus enrollment are added, and final enrollment is expected to be close to last year's total of 17,570, Foster said.

Undergraduate enrollment declined 2.3 percent with 12,368 students, down 301 from a year ago. However, graduate student enrollment increased 20 percent with 1,577 students registered, an increase of 266. The total decline in enrollment was less than 0.5 percent, Foster said.

Some administrators were afraid enrollment would decline drastically, President Jon Wefald said.

"When I spoke with people last spring and summer who were watching applications, they were predicting we would be off 800 to 900 students," he said.

Wefald said enrollment stabilization was a result of people working hard to recruit high school students and the attraction of graduate programs at the University.

He said his goal was to stabilize enrollment in Fall 1987 and then to increase enrollment in 1988.

"What we are trying to do is get our fair share of the high school students graduating from Kansas schools," he said. The University also will recruit non-traditional students in an effort to increase enrollment, he said.

Enrollment figures for the University of Kansas, Fort Hays State University and The Wichita State University were unavailable until a final count is tabulated. But preliminary counts at Emporia State University and Pittsburg State University indicated enrollment to be up slightly at those schools.

Officials may move campus post office

Plans cite Dykstra as new location

By SUE DAWSON
News Editor

University officials announced in a statement Aug. 19 the plans for relocation of the Central Campus Mail Service and contract post office located in Anderson Hall to Dysktra Hall.

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, was quoted in the statement that the move would take place within the next few weeks.

"Space previously occupied by the postal center will be renovated into offices for the newly created vice presidency for institutional advancement (Robert S. Krause) and that unit's staff," the release also said.

Yet, President Jon Wefald said confirmation of the move was "premature," and he and Miller had not been consulted before the news was released.

"In the next few weeks, we're going to look at all the possibilities," he said. "We don't want to do anything that doesn't make sense.

"No decision has been made."

Wefald said the facility may remain as is in Anderson, partially move out or completely relocate.

But Miller said he believes the facility must be moved out of its current location due to a limited amount of space.

"We think it would serve the people to have the contract post office elsewhere," he said. "This has been discussed for a considerable amount of time. All along we've intended, due to space requirements for distribution, to relocate the facility.

"Because of this campus mail distribution problem, we were considering that location (in Dykstra), but that's premature," Miller said.

Offices, such as the Office of Admissions, are being considered to occupy the space in Anderson when the postal facility is moved, he said.

Miller said he has not had a chance to look at the relocation, but he and his staff plan to review the situation during the next two weeks.

Wefald said Miller had been meeting with faculty and students during the last few months on the issue of moving the postal facility, but Miller indicated Fred Ferguson, physical plant director, was responsible for the interviewing.

Evelyn Hupe, facilities administrative officer, gave no indication the plan to relocate was tentative, and said the move would take place in the next five to six weeks.

She said the location was chosen to better serve the campus community and would create more office space as well as better service for postal patrons.

The change of location will make access easier for the groups on campus who send and receive the majority of the mail, including the Department of Housing, Jardine Terrace and the College of Agriculture, she said.

Volcanic gases kill 1,200 in Cameroon

By The Associated Press

YAOUNDE, Cameroon — Gas spewing from a volcanic lake in northwestern Cameroon killed at least 1,200 people and more victims may be found, President Paul Biya said Monday.

Information Minister Georges Ngango earlier told reporters that military reports from the scene spoke of a death toll of at least 2,000.

"The result of the disaster so far is about 1,200 dead," Biya told a news conference in the capital of this tropical West African nation. But he said the casualty figures were not complete.

He said between 200 and 300 people injured by the fumes were being treated in hospitals and army teams were still searching the four-square-mile disaster area for more victims from the disaster that started Friday.

"Wind blew toxic gases over the villages and this is what brought death to the people," Biya said.

Ngango, the information minister, said earlier that many villagers fled the toxic gases, while others were evacuated from a wide region around Lake Nios, about 200 miles northwest of Yaounde.

Joseph Mokassa, top staff aide to the provincial governor in Bamenda, the provincial capital, said by telephone he saw many dead but did not have precise figures.

"I went there on Saturday and it was such a frightful sight because so many people had lost their lives," he said.

Reports on the scale of the disaster coincided with the arrival Monday of Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who was expected to announce a resumption of diplomatic relations between the two countries. It was the first official visit to black Africa by an Israeli prime minister in more than 20 years.

Peres brought with him a 17-member Israeli medical team to assist local authorities, and France sent a team of doctors and chemical specialists. The Cameroon government appealed for more international aid.

President Paul Biya ordered that the dead be buried immediately to head off the spread of disease.

Officials said the nearest large settlement, the town of Wum with about 10,000 residents, was being evacuated.

A government announcement Sunday night said the killer gas was hydrogen sulfide, but volcanic experts questioned the analysis.

Haroun Tazieff, France's preeminent vulcanologist, was quoted by the French press as saying hydrogen sulfide is light

Report says Soviets to modify reactors

By The Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — The Soviet Union presented its report on the Chernobyl nuclear disaster to an international meeting Monday and acknowledged for the first time that about half of its Chernobyl-type reactors had been shut down for modifications.

The April 26 accident killed 31 people and sent radioactive debris around the globe. The Soviets previously denied that any similar reactors had been shut down because of the disaster, the worst on record at a nuclear plant.

The 382-page Soviet report put heavy blame on human error rather than faulty equipment for the explosion and fire.

The International Atomic Energy Agency was host at the five-day meeting which opened Monday. The agency is the U.N. body charged with promoting peaceful uses of nuclear power and making sure fuel is not used to make arms.

Director General Hans Blix will report conclusions of the meeting next month to directors of the agency, which is strengthening its requirements on reporting reactor accidents.

"The accident is traced above all to human failures," said Austrian scientist Walter Binner, director of the Institute for Reactor Safety near Vienna.

"The service personnel in Chernobyl could turn off some safety systems manually and that apparently is what happened. So you naturally ask yourself what good are safety systems if they can be blocked by human misjudgment," said Binner, who received the report last week.

"More information will probably come out in dribs and drabs during the course of the week," said an agency official. He spoke on condition of anonymity.

A report in The New York Times last Friday citing the Soviet study said it raised the possibility that 6,500 people will die prematurely because of the accident at the Ukrainian power plant.

Fish, vegetation and buildings near the plant will remain contaminated, according to the newspaper, and topsoil scraped up in parts of the 1,000 square mile evacuation zone was buried elsewhere as contaminated waste.

"Our experts have proposed a number of technical solutions which fit fully into the actual construction of our RBMK reactors," Valery A. Legasov, who leads the 28-member Soviet delegation, said Monday.

"Our specialists believe these should make it possible to continue

Iran, Russia sign fuel delivery pact

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iran announced Monday that it will resume natural-gas deliveries to the Soviet Union after a seven-year suspension, the first major agreement with the superpower neighbor since the 1979 Iranian revolution.

The official Islamic Republic News Agency, monitored in Nicosia, said that under the pact with Moscow, Iran will supply the Soviets with an estimated 105 million cubic feet of gas a day later this year.

The agency did not give a date for resumption of deliveries or say how much the Soviets will pay. But it said the volume would be increased to about 3 billion cubic feet a day by 1990.

Gas exports are vital to Iran's economy, battered by the country's 6-year-old war with Iraq, which costs $7 billion a year by official Iranian estimates. The declining price of oil, another crucial Iranian export, also has damaged the Iranian economy.

The announcement of the new deal came amid a major effort by Tehran to improve relations with the Soviets, the main arms supplier to Iraq. Likewise, Moscow has been interested in improving relations with Iran to increase its influence in the Persian Gulf region and play a role as a mediator in the war.

The Soviet Union, Iran's northern neighbor, had been an important transit point for Iranian natural gas exports. Natural gas was transmitted through a 690-mile pipeline to the Soviet Union and from there to Europe.

The Soviets use much of the gas for re-export to Eastern bloc countries that depend on subsidized low-price supplies from Moscow.

Carlin appoints 2 county officers

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin Monday announced the names of people he is appointing to fill unexpired terms in two county offices across the state, including a vacancy on the Allen County Commission.

Carlin appointed Gordon O. Conger, an Iola Republican, as the new 2nd District commissioner in Allen County. Conger succeeds Harry Shafer, also an Iola Republican, who is deceased.

The governor also appointed M. Charlotte Shawver, a Republican from Riley, as the Riley County register of deeds. Ms. Shawver succeeds Roxie Blankenhagen, a Manhattan Republican, who resigned.

Firefighters testify at arson hearing

LAWRENCE — Four witnesses testified in a preliminary hearing before Douglas County District Court Judge James Paddock Monday about a July 17 fire that killed a Lawrence firefighter.

David P. Winebrenner, 21, of Lawrence is accused of felony murder, aggravated arson and two counts of attempted murder. He is being held on $1 million bond in the Douglas County jail.

Winebrenner is accused of setting fire to his parents' home. His parents escaped the early morning blaze safely, but Mark Blair, 34, was killed in the fire.

Alan Sanders, the Douglas County coroner; Winebrenner's father, Douglas; fire captain Lloyd Hammerchmidt; and fire investigator Larry Stemmerman testified at Monday's hearing.

In Kansas, the state must show probable cause at the preliminary hearing to advance the case to district court.

Five-year-old mistakes gun for toy

BALTIMORE — A 5-year-old boy mistook a handgun for a toy and critically wounded his 2-year-old cousin, police said.

Dontia Lamont Farrow was shot in the head Saturday night and was in critical condition Monday at Johns Hopkins Hospital.

The victim's grandmother, who cares for him, told police that she and other family members left the children alone in the house while the rest of the family worked in the yard.

The 5-year-old apparently found the handgun and, thinking it was a toy, began playing with it.

An investigation is continuing, said Debbie Porter, a spokeswoman for the state police.

Lutherans to merge, create church

MILWAUKEE — Delegates from the nation's largest Lutheran denomination gathered Monday for their annual convention, which is expected to climax with the approval of a merger that would create the fourth-largest Protestant denomination in the country.

Delegates to the meeting of the 2.9 million-member Lutheran Church in America scheduled a busy week, including discussions of church issues and an appearance by Robert Runcie, the Archbishop of Canterbury.

But it was universally acknowledged that the primary purpose of this gathering was to approve the creation of a new Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, to consist of the LCA; the 2.3 million-member American Lutheran Church, and the 110,000-member American Evangelical Lutheran Churches.

Such a union, the result of four years of intense negotiations, and numerous false starts in the past, would not include all American Lutherans. The largest group outside of the new church would be the conservative Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, with 2.3 million members.

The other two partners in the merger also scheduled conventions this week in Midwestern cities: the ALC opened its meeting Saturday in Minneapolis, and the AELC was set to meet Tuesday in Chicago. All were to vote on the proposal late Thursday, with the results announced at a joint news conference on Friday.

The expected approval of the merger by the conventions this week is not the last hurdle that the union must leap.

Actor says VCRs reviving classics

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Veteran actor James Stewart says he's pleased that home video is rekindling enthusiasm for Hollywood classics.

"The interest in the films that were made in the '30s, '40s and '50s has grown so since they became available in video," Stewart said Sunday in accepting an award from a video industry group.

"It's a delight to me to know that because of video, new generations are being exposed to many wonderful, classic films, and that will in turn bring folks back into the theater," he said.

Stewart, 78, received the Presidential Award from the Video Software Dealers Association at the group's convention in Las Vegas. The award honors him for a movie career of nearly five decades that includes an Academy Award in 1940 for his role in "The Philadelphia Story," and four other Oscar nominations.

Many of Stewart's 80 movies are now out in video, including the Alfred Hitchcock thrillers "Vertigo" and "Rear Window."

Transistor breakdown interrupts KSDB signal

By The Collegian Staff

A transistor failure in KSDB-FM's transmitter knocked the campus radio station off the air for more than three hours Sunday.

Power was restored to 10 watts of the normal 125 watts Sunday and the station signed on at noon Monday with 50 percent power, said Lee Buller, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications.

Repairs should bring the station back up to 100 percent broadcasting capability by Wednesday afternoon, he said.

The failure occurred in the final stage of the transmitter which is located on the third floor of the McCain Auditorium Annex, he said. When the station operator tried restore the station's power, the transmitter failed, Buller said.

Station personnel spent nearly eight hours Sunday and Monday inspecting the transmission system and transmitter trying to determine the cause of the failure because it was the second to occur in three months, Buller said. The transistor failed this summer.

"The first time we wrote it off to aging parts. The second time you can't do that," he said.

Buller said lightning might have played a role in the failure.

"We suspect some sort of a lightning pulse damaged the surrounding components earlier in the summer which carried to the transistor," he said.

The station will continue to broadcast at 50 percent power until another transistor arrives and repairs can be completed, he said. Reception in Manhattan should not be affected by the decrease in power but outlying areas will not be able to pick up KSDB's signal as effectively, Buller said.

Lafene offers insurance coverage for off-campus treatment

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

Students still have time to sign up for a new health plan offered through Lafene Student Health Center.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas now provides insurance through Lafene covering supplementary medical care obtained off campus.

"The purpose of supplementary health insurance is to protect the subscriber from the high costs of health services obtained elsewhere and from certain services not provided free at Lafene, such as an overnight stay," said David McKee, local representative of Blue Cross and Blue Shield.

"All K-State students who pay the student health fee are eligible for medical care at Lafene Student Health Center, as before," he said.

Changes in Kansas law pertaining to health insurance affected all plans offered in the state.

"The major change made by HB 2737 (Kansas House Bill 2737) is that, where outpatient nervous and mental, alcoholism and drug abuse treatment were optional coverage before, as of July 1 they are mandated by law, and are included in all health insurance programs written in Kansas," McKee said.

"Blue Cross and Blue Shield has replaced the Keystone Insurance Company health coverage previously offered through Lafene. Those students covered by the Keystone program are not automatically covered by our plan. Application must be made for coverage," McKee said.

McKee said the new plan is more lenient than others offered previously through Lafene and the University.

"For those students having continuous coverage by Keystone up until the effective date of Blue Cross and Blue Shield coverage, there is no waiting period for coverage of pre-existing conditions.

"The waiting period has been waived. This waiver applies also to international students under any of the three plans available to them," McKee said.

The waiting period is eight months for students without continuous coverage from Keystone, McKee said.

The waiting period under Blue Cross and Blue Shield for pre-existing conditions applies only to conditions for which treatment was received in the last 90 days, McKee said.

On most other plans, American students have a one-year waiting period for coverage of pre-existing conditions, and foreign students have a three-year waiting period for this coverage, McKee said.

McKee also said the $250 deductible is different from that found in other plans. Blue Cross and Blue Shield pays 50 percent of covered expenses, starting with the first dollar paid, until $250 per person or $500 per family has been spent in one year.

Thereafter, the plan pays 100 percent, up to $1 million per person. This gives the subscriber cost predictability, McKee said.

Ninety percent of the doctors and all of the hospitals in Kansas have agreed, under the Competitive Allowance Program, to accept as payment in full whatever Blue Cross and Blue Shield pays for any particular type of procedure or treatment. This is known as the "hold harmless" clause, because the subscriber is not liable for any over charges.

Another change students and their families should note is that there is no longer an "open enrollment," whereby students can sign up for coverage at anytime, McKee said.

Students now must sign up for the plan during a 21-day period at the beginning of each session. The latest date to enroll in the program for the fall term is Sept. 12.

Coverage begins Aug. 22 and can be paid monthly, quarterly or semi-annually, McKee said. Therefore, the first billing period will be irregular, covering nine days in August and all of September. Thereafter, the billings will cover one or three calendar months, or half a year, depending on which payment option is selected.

Brochures and applications can be obtained throughout the 21-day enrollment period at the Student Governing Association office in the Union, at the International Student Center, at Lafene Student Health Center, at the office of the dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, and at the Blue Cross and Blue Shield office, 2312 Anderson Ave.

Students who did not sign up for health insurance at registration can apply at tables set up today and Wednesday outside the Union cafeteria.

The tables will be staffed today from 10:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. and Wednesday from 9 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

Budget cuts provoke Koeppe's resignation

The resignation of Provost Owen Koeppe was no surprise to the administration. However, coming at the beginning of a new year it may surprise students who follow activities of the administration.

Koeppe's duties included setting University priorities and administering budget programs. Since he started the job in 1980, the University has been plagued by decreasing enrollment and statewide economic problems that provoked budget cuts from the Board of Regents.

Six years telling deans that colleges must make budget cuts were more than enough for Koeppe. He said his qualms were not with the new administration, but with a state budgeting system that cuts funds to institutions already hurting.

Perhaps his resignation was Koeppe's way of telling the Regents that the University's situation is irreversible without support.

Whatever his reasons, the University is fortunate that Koeppe will be staying at K-State to work in other capacities.

Haitians desire food, not military buildup

In the six months since Jean-Claude Duvalier was deported from Haiti, people of the island country still face unemployment, disease and starvation.

As a solution to Haiti's problems, Secretary of State George Shultz and Lt. Gov. Henri Namphy, the new Haitian leader, discussed $6 million in military aid from the United States.

The reaction of the people to $6 million in military aid resulted in the first Haitian anti-American demonstration in 20 years. The people want food, not weapons.

The Reagan administration believes Haiti needs military equipment for policing purposes. In addition to trucks, the aid package would include ambulances, communication equipment and maintenance training.

The flaw in this logic — if it can be called logic — is that the people of Haiti riot in the first place because they are unemployed and hungry. Military equipment does not solve the fundamental problem in Haiti.

U.S. policy in Haiti cannot be completely condemned. The House has budgeted more than $1 million to be used mostly for food and development in Haiti. The administration is encouraging investment both from U.S. corporations and from foreign investors — a step toward helping the 50 percent unemployment rate.

In future policy toward Haiti, the United States must pursue the latter type of aid, not unwanted military equipment.

'Star Wars' resembles movie script

JONIE TRUED
Managing Editor

We are now into the third year of President Reagan's proposed Strategic Defense Initiative, dubbed "Star Wars" by media folk with tongues-in-cheek, and public optimism about the defense plan is falling.

Many scientists supposedly researching the anti-missile system reached conclusions of defeat long ago. According to their statements the only place SDI, as currently planned, will exist is in our president's movie-washed mind.

Even Reagan's staunchest supporters are bickering among themselves as to what SDI can and should be expected to accomplish — astrodome protection (like Holidome fun only on a larger scale) for the whole U.S. population or spotty protection concentrated around vital industrial centers.

Reagan is all aglow about the astrodome America concept. In this case, defense stations would be located in strategic positions enabling them to target incoming Soviet missiles in space and shoot them with lasers. This would explode the missile outside of the Earth's immediate atmosphere and avoid nuclear radiaton from directly affecting the environment.

But these are pipe dreams according to 1,600 scientists who presented an open letter to Congress stating that "the realization of this dream isn't feasible in the foreseeable future." Just the appearance of the word "dream" in this context should be a major clue.

SDI researchers say for that type of defense to work the lasers would have to be at 100 percent target accuracy while the incoming missile is at the peak of its climb — only then is it outside the ozone layer. And, in case you are wondering, missiles are not all that large; thus making them quite elusive targets especially while traveling at thousands of miles per hour.

Currently, the most powerful lasers in existence can't hit the broadside of a barn at 20 paces and inflict significant damage.

America's business leaders have more realistic applications for the SDI concept. Instead of protecting the 240 million people living throughout the United States they would like to protect small areas where natural resources and industrial production centers are located.

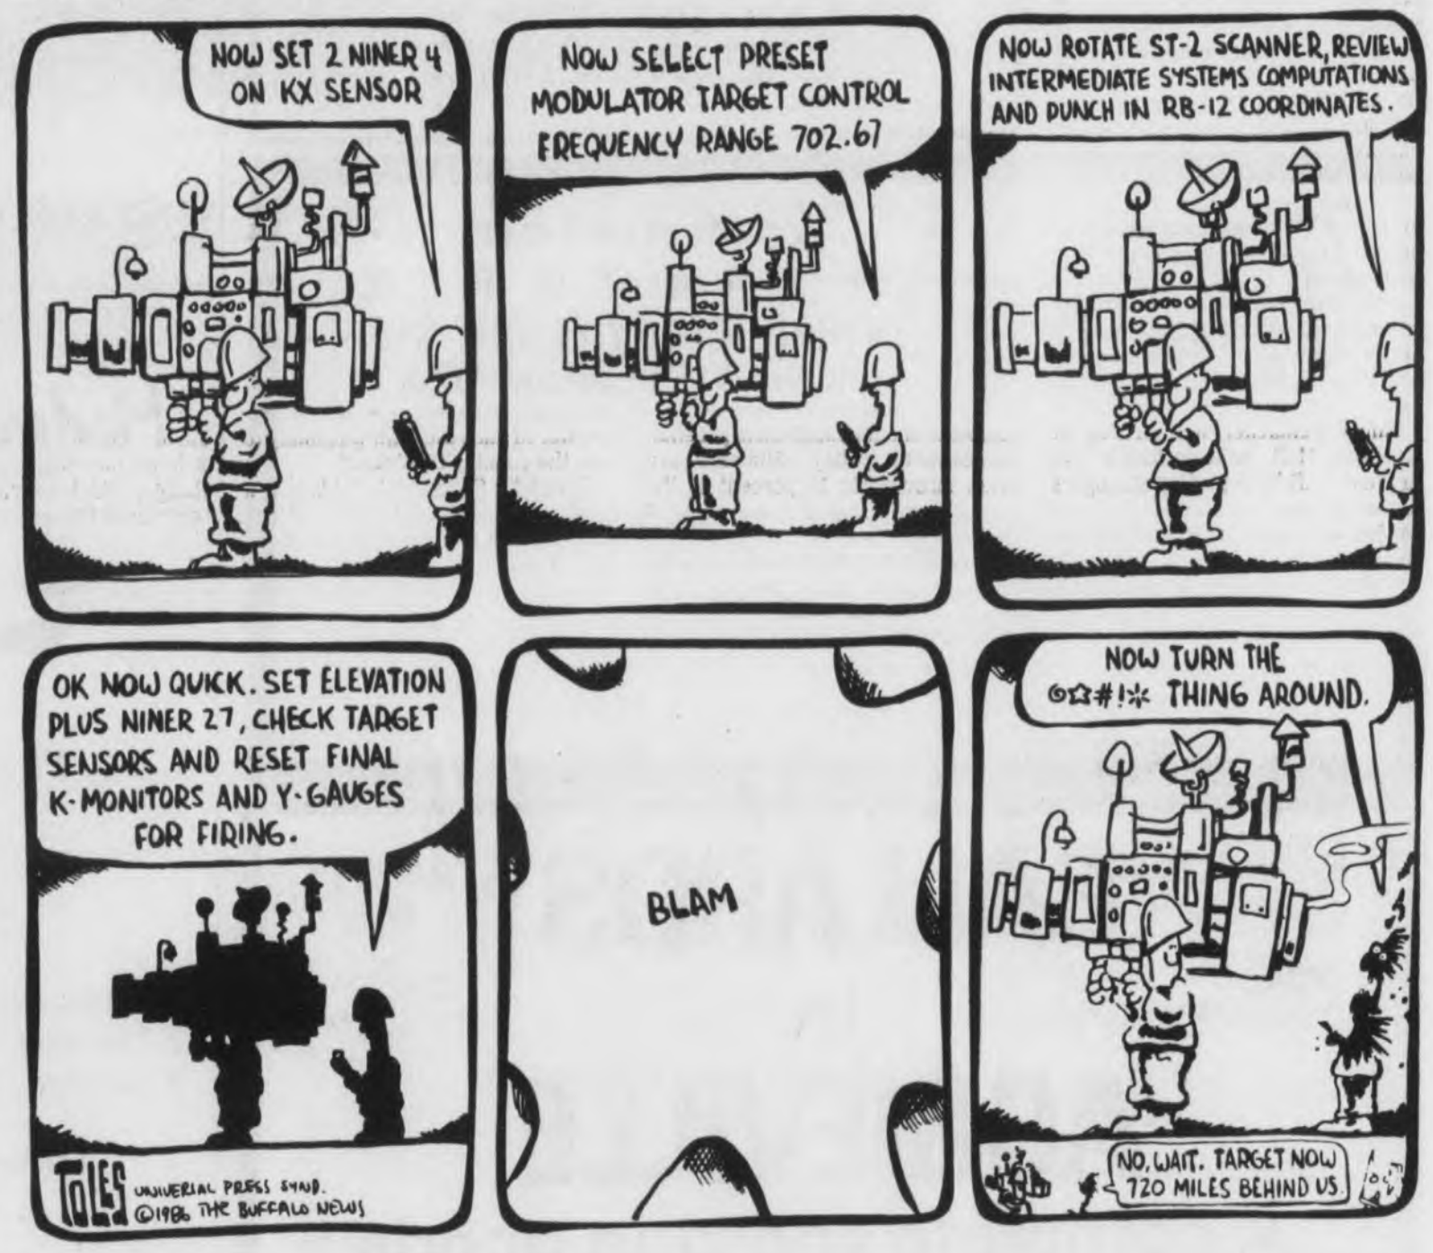
Their goal, to put it mildly, is thoroughly unhumanitarian — an entirely materialistic approach that is unacceptable to all who live in the real world.

But putting infeasibility to the side for a moment and thinking strictly in terms of an operation astrodome defense plan, there are logistical flaws to ponder as well.

Reagan has switched stances on whether the Soviets have a laser defense initiative so many times he has the American public absolutely baffled. The fact is, there is no evidence to support a notion that the Soviets have any technology similar to SDI. If it occurred to them at all they were smart enough to dismiss it.

The president also habitually states that SDI will not be a "bargaining chip" in arms negotiations. He continues to repeat the message hoping everyone, including the Soviets, will think SDI is nearly operational and is actually a serious defensive tool. It's an implied myth. SDI is a concept, an idea...a military fairy tale.

Another message Reagan sends out frequently is that "when" SDI is operational it will make the existence of nuclear weapons obsolete. But at the same time he says for national security interests the United States should continue to stockpile warheads. Why?



Because he knows, as well as researchers the world over and the Soviet government, that any defense can be overwhelmed by a better offense.

The terrible truth is, even if SDI could be 100 percent target accurate the Soviets could send over enough missiles in one attack to entirely overwhelm any defensive laser system. And it's a lot less expensive for them to stockpile warheads than it is for us to waste time on long-range laser targeting.

If we concentrate on building an anti-missile system that would have no guarantees of hitting the targets and can be easily overrun the results could be disasterous. Reagan knows that. But like all actors do, he wants to reinterpret the script and take the glory for a fantasy blockbuster.

That brings us full cycle to retaliation as a defense — which, historically, is a threat that works. Reagan knows that too, and he said so in his 1983 speech introducing the "Star Wars" approach to defense.

But he thinks SDI is a more humanitarian angle to settling the question of who is going to blow up whom — or who is not going to blow up whom. The premise is wrong to begin with. We should not be preoccupied with the destruction of anyone. Negotiations, with the realistic premise regarding a quality existence for all peoples, should be the ultimate importance.

University offers gifts of opportunity, friends

DANIEL A. BEGGS
Guest Columnist

Freshmen are easy to pick out with their purple clothes, topographical maps of campus, sad puppy eyes and dazed expressions. Every few minutes, some poor soul breaks and bolts down a sidewalk hysterically humming "Purple Rain." Those of us who have been around a while know most of the closet cases are freshmen — or architecture students.

The first day of college is a trauma through which we all lived. The campus seems huge, and it can make one feel very small. It probably will not seem to shrink much in the weeks that follow. Everything is new — even the roommates who you have probably never seen in your life — and here you are smack in the middle of it. Whoopee. But, don't get discouraged because sitting in front of you are three huge purple and white gifts that college wrapped up just for freshmen: new friends, new freedom and new opportunities. Let's start with gift No. 2 — always begin with whatever is the most fun.

Freedom at last — you no longer have a curfew. You no longer must switch off the rock station to tune in classical music for your dad. You no longer must mow the lawn on Saturday or bring home the voluptuous blonde you have been dating (girls fill in the appropriate term for what you bring home) to meet your parents.

Of course, it's not all peaches and cream. You also have the freedom to do your own laundry, study without being reminded and make it to your 7:30 a.m. lecture. Although 7:30 classes are sadistic, that first taste of freedom is incredible.

You are free now, so who are you going to enjoy it with? Most or all of your friends went to college somewhere else or stayed home, and, regardless of freedom, you miss mom and dad.

Enter the next gift college presents to you: new friends. You have 17,000 chances. Even the law of averages is on your side. If you are still out of luck, try brushing your teeth. Also, it stands to reason that among so many people, you have a much better chance of finding people who are like you.

Moreover, college is built around the idea of meeting people. Your can't lose. There are fraternities or sororities, residence halls and scholarship halls, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and organizations for every conceivable purpose. Everyone of these groups or places is designed to bring people together to share ideas — which a good lead-in to the third gift college has to give you: opportunities.

This is going to be a shock so prepare yourself. Ready? You're not at college just to have fun. Take it easy — don't hyperventilate — there will still be time for fun. However, you need an education, and an education is more that straight A's. It's other activities and challenges which help in the "real world."

Your personality must keep pace with your mind in the four or five years you have at K-State. This is accomplished by taking advantage of opportunity. If you have ever received a package at Christmas or your birthday that was really a bunch of little gifts all tied together, you have a good idea of what opportunity is all about. One experience may teach self assurance; another might point out the right major. Whatever you gain, you have nothing to lose by taking opportunities as they come.

K-State is a good school and, with some perseverance, you can wind up with a great education and some pretty out of hand memories in a few years. You have everything to look forward to, so lower those topographical maps, perk up those puppy eyes and take a look around. New freedom, friends and opportunities will be winking back at you. Have fun, learn to study, and for God's sake, don't wear purple and white on campus.

Pride shines in campus atmosphere

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

"Purple Pride" — what a disgusting slogan. How could anyone be proud of K-State? After all, our teams don't do well in intercollegiate sports; nobody great, like a president, has come from here, and besides, we're just a small school in a town that's in a state somewhere in the middle of the United States. So come on, there's nothing great about K-State. How could anyone have Purple Pride?

If you really think like that about K-State then University President Jon Wefald is correct in saying that K-State is a well-kept secret.

To find Purple Pride we can't look at a win-loss record, a famous persons list or the enrollment level. We have to look at fellow students and faculty.

K-Staters have more than a name and ID number; they have something those at some other universities lack — personalities glowing with pride and respect for their fellow students. Where else but K-State can two students — total strangers to each other — have the politeness to say "hi" or at least make an acknowledgment of the other person's presence when passing on the sidewalk? All this is evident in the way people walk around campus — here we keep our chin up — not our nose.

This congenial spirit also lasts in the careers of those who graduate from the University. Former students have gained a reputation for friendliness among employers and associates, leading them to more rewarding lives than those graduating from other schools. It's understandable that this personality is influenced by a competent faculty that is not hostile towards students, but hospitable. Instructors are constantly aware of and concerned with the progress of students, as well as helpful and trustworthy in advising.

K-Staters continually put Purple Pride into action. The campus flourishes with housing groups, honoraries, clubs and other organizations unselfishly dedicated to the advancement of those around them. The charitable campaigns and community improvement projects of these various groups have demonstrated a level of responsibility in which the administration feels safe to give more governing control to the students.

Through Student Senate and college councils, students have more control over activities and academic life than at other colleges and universities. Perhaps it's this sense of generosity and citizenship that brings so many dignitaries to campus to address students through the Landon Lecture Series on Public Affairs. It is appropriate to conclude that Purple Pride played an important part in making the Landon Lectures, as Vice President George Bush said, "America's most distinguished lecture series."

This year we will see a different twist added to Purple Pride as the University goes in new directions under the leadership of a new University president, as well as in changes ranging from the athletic department to the radio station. Furthermore, as 1986 is an election year, I invite everyone to exercise the fundamental right of democracy by voting on November 4. Likewise, remember to register to vote at home, or here in Riley County.

In the meantime, as a Collegian columnist, I will strive to offer thought-provoking opinions on issues concerning everything from education to the election, and from the University to the world. At the same time, I encourage everyone to share ideas through letters to the editor and guest columns.

The 1986-87 school year marks not only a great year to witness Purple Pride in action, but also an excellent opportunity to join in the spirit that drives the University. It is the spirit of Purple Pride that allows us, unlike our rivals at other universities, to have more to take pride in than just athletic teams.

I hope everyone will join in the rekindling of Purple Pride.

Letters Policy

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR pertaining to matters of public interest are encouraged. All letters must be typewritten or neatly printed and signed by the author and should not exceed 300 words. The author's major, classification or other identification and a telephone number where the author can be reached during business hours must be included. The Collegian reserves the right to edit letters for style and spatial considerations, and to withhold letters from publications.

Letters may be brought to Kedzie 116 or mailed to the Collegian Editorial Page Editor, Kedzie 103, Kansas State University, Manhattan, Kan. 66506.

Identification program may reduce theft rate, increase recovery odds

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

With the start of a new school year, students and their possessions make likely targets for criminals.

Last year, 421 thefts and 126 break-ins were reported on campus.

Lt. James Tubach of the K-State Police said one way students can help prevent crime and recover stolen items is by taking advantage of Operation Identification, a community crime prevention program.

Operation ID is a two step process. The first involves engraving all valuables with the owner's driver's license number and state initials. Second, owners record these items for their personal records with descriptions and serial numbers.

Burglars are less likely to take engraved items because they are harder to sell, and if they are stolen it is much easier to recover them, Tubach said.

When merchandise is reported stolen, the police will enter the driver's license number and description of the item into the National Crime Information Computer.

"With the driver's license number we can go to our computer and within a matter of seconds we can find out who that driver's license belongs to," Tubach said.

When the merchandise is found, it can be traced to an owner in any part of the country.

Charles Beckom, superintendent of the campus police, said more students should participate in Operation ID.

"I doubt that 2 percent (of the students) engrave their things. We would probably do 50 to 100 percent better in returning items if at least half of the student population would do this," he said.

Students can obtain use of an engraver by contacting the campus police department.

Beckom said students could also prevent theft by keeping an eye on purses or wallets, and concealing their money.

"Don't display money, especially in large sums. It attracts attention of others and you never know who you are attracting the attention of," he said.

Emily Weinacker, hall director at Goodnow Hall, said residents can prevent theft by reporting strangers to the front desk or staff on duty and by locking doors when leaving the room.

Weinacker said she also suggests that residents "don't leave books and valuables out in the lobby without being attended."

Sharon Rentmeester, hall director at Ford Hall, said she encourages crime prevention programs to make students aware of security procedures.

She said she participated in them at the University of Decatur, Millikin, Ill., where she was a hall director for the last two years.

During "Security Awareness Week" at her former hall, a police officer spoke about crime prevention, and staff members put up posters to remind residents of security tips.

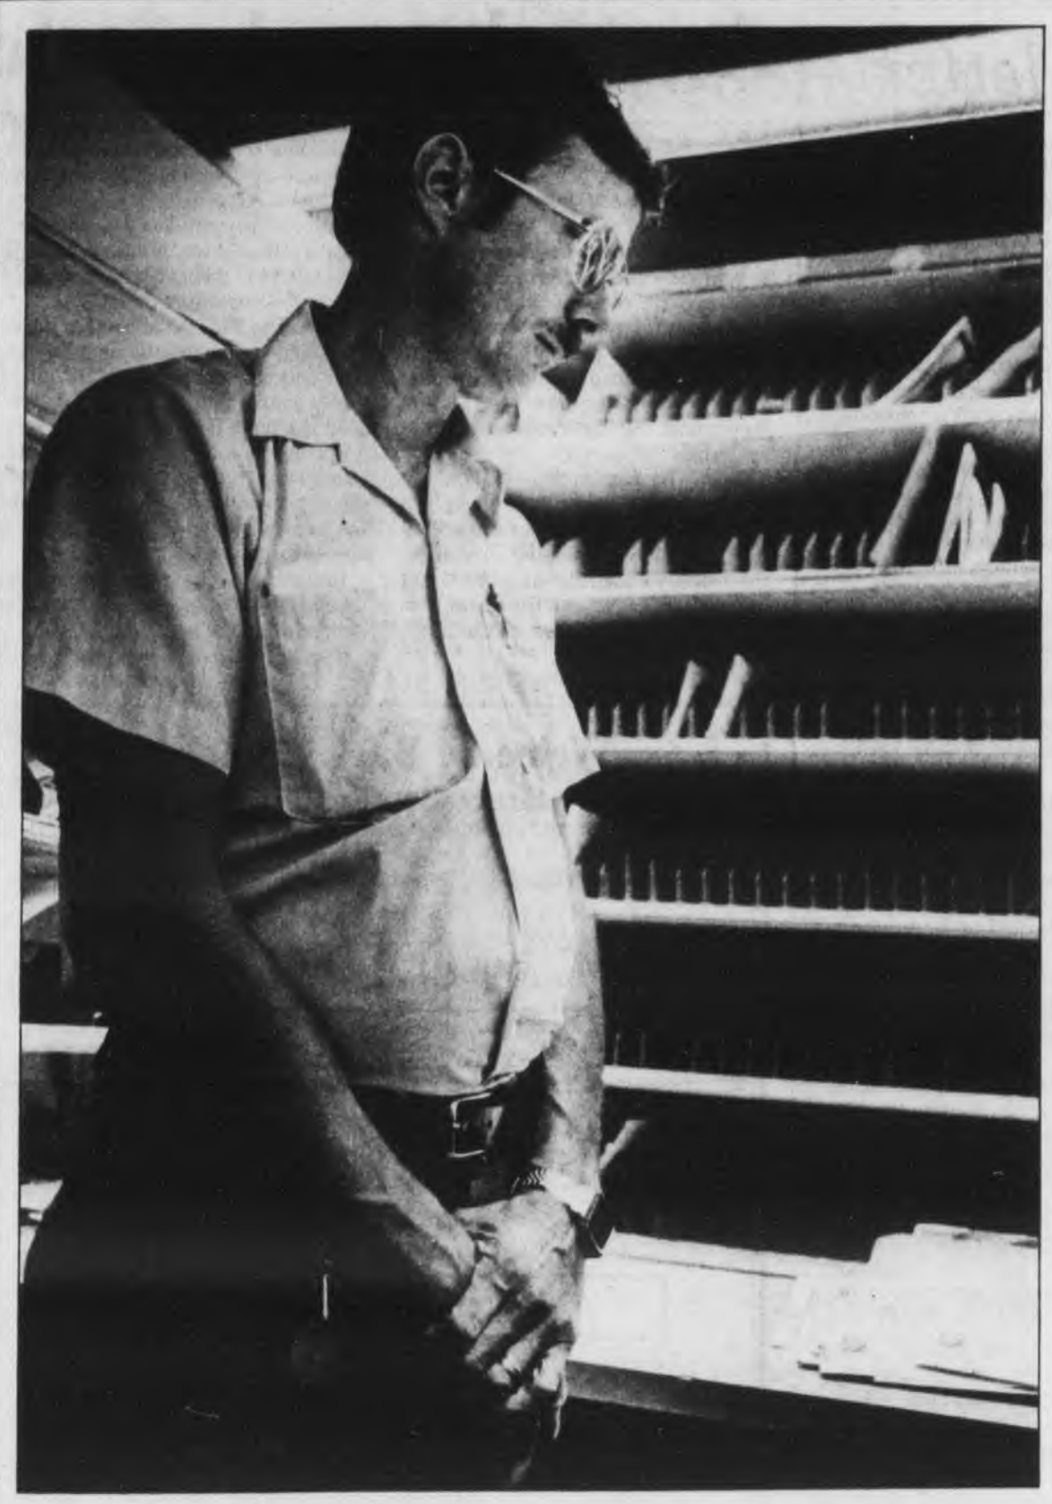
The staff also went into unlocked rooms and left cards with a picture of a burglar on them saying, "This could have been him, remember to lock your doors."

Rentmeester brought the engraver for Ford Hall residents to use and plans on having a "security awareness week" in the fall, she said.

Tim Trubey, vice president of McCullough Development Inc., an apartment rental and building company, said he believes most crimes happen when there is easy access to entrance.

"Most of the break-ins that we've been exposed to in the past occur when there doesn't have to be a break-in," he said. "If you've got a window that's open and they (burglars) can slit the screen to get in, that's when troubles occur."

Trubey suggests residents leave a light on when going out to deter a potential criminal.



"Most crimes occur when somebody knows that somebody's gone," he said.

During vacations, residents should hide televisions and other large items in closets and take easy-to-carry valuables home with them, Trubey said.

Ronald Hill, owner of Hill Investment & Rental Co., said he suggests residents get personal property coverage.

Personal property insurance for apartment tenants in Manhattan ranges from about $40 to $80 a year. The cost varies depending on the insurance company, size of apartment complex and value of the property.

Before purchasing a rental policy, residents should check their parents' homeowners policy. Students are often insured for 10 percent of the contents coverage. For example, if their parents are covered for $50,000 for contents of the house, students will be insured for up to $5,000.

Feds hold Soviet official without bond

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A Soviet employee of the United Nations was ordered held without bail Monday on an espionage charge after a federal prosecutor argued the man was likely to flee the country if released.

Gennadiy Fedorovich Zakharov, a U.N. scientific affairs officer suspected of being a member of the Soviet secret police, was arrested Saturday night as he allegedly attempted to buy classified information from an FBI informant at a subway station in the borough of Queens.

Zakharov, who does not have diplomatic immunity, was arraigned Monday before U.S. Magistrate Carol Amon in Brooklyn, who ordered him held on the espionage charge, which carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment on conviction.

The charge was spelled out as "conspiracy to deliver or attempt to deliver defense documents to be used to the injury of the United States and to the advantage of a foreign nation."

U.S. Attorney Andrew Maloney argued for withholding bail because of the charge's seriousness and the fact that Zakharov is a Soviet citizen "believed by the FBI to be a member of the KGB."

Maloney noted that Zakharov's wife and daughter were out of the country and said he poses a "high risk of flight."

According to the FBI, Zakharov first approached the FBI informant three years ago when the man was still a college student. However, the relationship did not become illegal until Saturday with an exchange of classified information, authorities said.

The case illustrates how the Soviets often maintain legal contacts with Americans before pumping them for secrets, the FBI said.

Official's drug letter spurs campus action

From Staff and Wire Reports

Nineteen days after the cocaine-induced death of University of Maryland basketball star Len Bias, Education Secretary William Bennett advised college presidents to write students this summer: "Welcome back for your studies in September. But no drugs on campus. None. Period."

K-State President Jon Wefald said Monday he has not received the statement from Bennett, who is to deliver the 73rd Landon Lecture Sept. 9 in McCain Auditorium.

As the new school year begins, the call for harsher drug policies is being heeded at some colleges.

Ohio Wesleyan's President David L. Warren wrote letters to parents and students serving notice that drug use would bring on a range of reprisals, including dismissal. The school is also outlawing drug paraphernalia this year.

Harvey Saunders, president of tiny Westminster College in Fulton, Mo., sent letters to each of his 650 students this summer citing the Bias case and warning that any drug user who refused counseling could be expelled.

At Newberry College in South Carolina, the police, rather than the tiny school's disciplinary council will be called in to handle even minor drug offenses.

Freshman orientation at Mount St. Mary College in Newburgh, N.Y., will include drug education for the first time, offered by college officials, health experts and law enforcement officers.

Many other schools have begun voluntary or mandatory drug testing programs for athletes. The University of Maryland this summer announced it will have more frequent unannounced drug testing of its athletes in the wake of the Bias death, along with closer scrutiny of the testing to ensure that urine samples can't be switched.

An annual Gallup poll on education issues released last weekend found that the public considers drugs the biggest problem facing schools, and 49 percent approve drug testing of students, while 44 percent opposed it.

Some congressmen hope to apply added pressure for campus anti-drug action with a proposed amendment to the fiscal 1987 education appropriation bill which would block federal funds to any school that doesn't have a drug prevention program.

But many college officials contacted by The Associated Press took issue with suggestions that their drug policies weren't tough enough.

Only a minority said they planned stiffer penalties for drug offenders or tighter campus security.

The University of Michigan and Boston University, for instance, are among many schools that have long claimed the right to search a student's dorm room for illegal substances or terminate a student's residence hall lease for sale or use of drugs.

"We're not new to that game," said Southern Illinois University chancellor Lawrence Pettit. "We've always been against drug use. It's not as though the administration in Washington is going to change regulations or sanctions at any university."

Many argued that more and better drug education, rather than harsh legal or academic penalties, would better solve the problem.

Before the Bias incident, Temple University in Philadelphia had focused its anti-drug efforts on athletes. This fall, the administration plans drug talks and literature for the entire student body, spokeswoman Kathy Gosliner said.

College officials said that campus drug use is down considerably from the 1960s and 1970s. For most students, alcohol is by far the "drug of choice."

Agriculture, laws focus of conference

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

With increased connections between farming and the law, many in agriculture are finding it necessary to be aware of changes in legislation.

To explain recent changes in laws regarding farmers, Cooperative Extension Service presented a satellite video conference Monday evening shown at various locations throughout the state and on satellite systems.

Sam Brownback, extension specialist in agriculture law, explained changes in laws regarding fencing and trespassing livestock, the Family Farm Rehabilitation Act (SB 696), tax laws and the Farm Products Law of the Universal Commercial Code.

SB 696, passed in the 1986 legislative season, has already been a source of confusion, Brownback said, with judges declaring it constitutional in one county, and unconstitutional in another. It is scheduled to be heard by the Kansas Supreme Court later this fall.

Basically, the law allows an insolvent farmer to continue farming the land and using machinery for up to three years after foreclosure proceedings have been filed.

The debtor must still pay the court, in advance, interest for one year on the land retained. Brownback said the current rate would be about 8 percent.

In the case of farm equipment, the debtor would also have to pay the depreciation for the time period.

The bill "is not a panacea for all financial problems," he said, noting that it only allows "a couple years leeway to get things back together."

Another law reviewed by Brownback during the satellite conference was fencing and a livestock owner's liability for damages caused by an animal.

Basically, the new law regards three-wire fencing as "legal fencing."

Brownback said this is a minimum, with the new law allowing county commissioners to set higher standards for their jurisdiction.

He also said that, generally, an owner would have to be found guilty of negligence before being held responsible for damages caused by livestock outside of legal fences.

Changes in the farm product section of the Universal Commercial Code were also discussed, although Kansas has yet to implement the change.

Generally, new rules allow the state to use either the Secretary of State's office to notify purchasers of farm goods used as loan security, or require sellers to notify buyers of outstanding loans.

Doug Beech, extension agriculture economist, also warned viewers that liquidation or foreclosure to satisify debts can be regarded as income by the Internal Revenue Service, and can "significantly increase" tax liability.

Teachers, students adapt to school

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

The first day of a new college semester is a transitory time for any student. But for freshmen the experience can be frightening.

The by-now cliche image of a freshman is a student bumbling along with a map in one hand, class schedule in the other and a glazed look in both eyes.

Whether the student graduated with a big high school class or one with 52 students like Dea Dix, freshman in general, the feeling is the same: in high school "you know all the people, here you don't."

While it isn't possible to know everyone in all classes, Jeff Hudson, graduate student in English and a graduate teaching assistant, tries to get his English Composition I students to learn a little bit about each other.

Hudson also stresses a sense of equality between himself and his students.

"I don't expect to sit up here like God and teach to you like lesser gods," he told his Comp. I class Monday morning.

Respect from instuctors is something important, said Shelly Guggisberg, freshman in education.

"In high school you were treated like, well, high school (students)," she said. "Here it seems like you get a lot more respect."

While first-semester freshmen must adapt to new surroundings, some of their teachers may also be doing the same.

"The biggest thing is balancing classes," said Mark Jarvis, graduate student in English and a first-time teaching assistant. "I'm adapting this semester."

In addition to teaching two sections of English Composition, Jarvis is taking six hours of course work.

Jarvis said he was a little tense Monday morning before his first class but "I walked a lot and talked to everyone I knew to calm down.

"I even made sure I had enough chalk."

Disputes about pilot salaries leave fate of Frontier Airlines uncertain

By The Associated Press

DENVER — The fate of Frontier Airlines and its 4,700 employees was uncertain Monday as United Airlines tried to come up with an acceptable agreement that would allow it to buy the shut-down Frontier.

United previously agreed to buy Frontier from its parent, People Express Inc., but ran into a roadblock in trying to agree with the pilots' union on pay scales.

People Express shut down Frontier on Sunday, saying Frontier was out of cash and promising to liquidate the Denver-based airline if the pilots could not come to terms with United. But Frontier spokeswoman Marilyn Mishkin said Monday that lawyers for both airlines were still talking.

"I think that not every card has been played," said Mishkin.

People Express, which bought Frontier in November for $300 million, announced early Sunday that Frontier would file in bankruptcy court for protection from creditors Monday if no agreement was reached between United and the Air Line Pilots Association.

The shutdown of Frontier, which served 55 U.S. cities west of Chicago and four Canadian cities, idled nearly 4,700 workers and left about 17,000 passengers a day scrambling for seats on other airlines.

Last month, United offered $146 million for the 40-year-old regional airline provided it could reach agreement with Frontier's five labor unions.

Talks with the pilots' union resumed Sunday after a lapse of several days, but broke off again early Monday.

United and its pilots couldn't agree on when Frontier pilots would receive the same salaries as United pilots, said United spokesman Matthew Gonring.

A Boeing 727 captain at Frontier makes about $68,000 a year compared with $115,000 at United, United spokesman Joseph Hopkins said. United wanted the gap closed in five years; ALPA asked for about four years in its last proposal, Hopkins said.

But while those negotiations produced no agreement, "talks have been continuing between our counsel and United," Frontier spokeswoman Mishkin said at midday. "They're still continuing to pursue every available means they have to get a deal."

In its announcement of the shutdown, People Express, said it was taking the action because Frontier was out of money.

People Express announced in July it would sell Frontier, which lost $10 million a month in the first six months of 1986 and was an important reason for the parent company's $132.48 million first-half loss.

People Express had indicated it would delay bankruptcy proceedings if United reached agreement with the pilots, United spokesman Kurt Stocker said.

House waits, snoozes as Senate keeps going

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The midnight oil was burning and the Senate and the House were churning toward a three-week vacation.

The hour was late, near four in the morning on Saturday, Aug. 15, and Congress was finally close to wrapping up an 18-hour day and going home, ending a two-week marathon of late-night sessions.

In the sedate Senate, Sen. Rudy Boschwitz, R-Minn., was asleep, slumped in his chair on the Senate floor as debate droned on around him. It took a roll call vote to wake him up.

In the House, which recessed for hours waiting for the long-winded Senate to complete work on a debt ceiling bill, Rep. Clarence E. Miller, R-Ohio, complained about procedures.

The House leadership wanted unanimous consent to order the House into recess "subject to the call of the chair." But Miller wanted the recess to end at "a time certain."

It was all too much for house Republican Leader Bob Michel of Illinois.

"Some of us want to get our bags packed and get out of town tomorrow," he said. "If the gentleman is tired he can go back to the office and poop out and we will call the gentleman."

The leadership prevailed and the House waited out the Senate. Some members napped in their offices. Others abandoned Capitol Hill altogether and went home to bed.

Finally, at 3:30 a.m., the word came that the Senate had acted and House members were called for a roll call vote.

It was obvious that some House members had come to the floor straight from their slumbers, a haste that put some in violation of the dress code that requires the wearing of a coat and tie on the Senate floor.

When Rep. Timothy Wirth of Colorado, a Democrat, walked onto the floor he was tieless. And Republicans, observant of the rules at any hour, shouted, "Tie! Tie! Tie!"

Democrats had their revenge a few moments later when Republican Rep. E. Clay Shaw of Florida walked in clad in a dark suit and tie.

One fellow member noticed that although Shaw was wearing shoes, he had neglected to put on socks.

So the cry went up from the Democratic side of the aisle, "Socks! Socks! Socks!"

Back in the Senate, Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., and Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., assessed the situation.

"We were forced into this spurt of frenetic activity, having frittered away a great deal off time in the period immediately prior to this two-week mad dash toward the recess," Byrd told the Senate.

But Dole said he was satisfied at the Senate's accomplishments to date.

When the time came early on that Saturday morning to adjourn until Sept. 8, Rep. Philip Crane, R-Ill., demanded a recorded roll call vote.

When it was concluded, 202 representatives had voted to recess.

But 91 had voted no. One member voted "present."

And 137 had not shown up at all.

K-State triple-jumper Kenny Harrison is nearing a world triple-jump record according to his personal coach Steve Miller. During European meets this summer Harrison defeated world-record-holder Willie Banks four times.

'Cats' Harrison grows with coach's direction

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Kenny Harrison and Steve Miller's relationship goes beyond the normal bond of athlete and coach.

Miller, the former K-State track and field coach and now assistant athletic director, said he will remain Harrison's coach for the two remaining years of the triple jumper's eligibility.

"Only in the United States are athletes coached in groups. Other parts of the world there is almost always a one-to-one, or one-to-two- or -three relationship. What Kenny and I are attempting to do is to improve the normal U.S. situation. It should enhance his abilities enormously," Miller said.

The reason it is vital Harrison receive intensive coaching outside of what the new K-State track and field coach John Capriotti can offer is that in Miller's view, the Wildcat junior may be on the verge of conquering the world record.

Harrison spent two weeks over the summer on a six-meet tour in Europe with a team representing the United States. In the process, Harrison defeated world record holder Willie Banks four times, claimed two first places, one second and a fourth.

"I think I jumped pretty well. I was in the 55-foot range. That's how far I had been jumping all year, but seeing it was the end of the year, I was still around that distance and I'm really tired," Harrison said.

"He did spectacular for his first time in Europe," Miller said. "It was an adjustment both athletically and emotionally. The biggest thing it gave him was some seasoning. It extended the length of his year. He knows what it is to compete in the Olympic Games in a sense that your season goes beyond the regular college season."

That experience, Miller believes, is invaluable to Harrison, for Miller is without a doubt that Harrison is preparing to blossom into the world's most dominating triple jumper.

Harrison started the season with a personal best jump of 54 feet, 1-1/4 inches and improved that to 57 feet, 1½ inches. When a jumper improves his personal best three feet in one season, Banks' record of 58 feet, 11-1/4 doesn't seem far off.

"I've coached some athletes who have been world record holders and I've coached some kids who have been some outstanding athletes in the world, but Kenny Harrison is the best I've ever coached," said Miller of K-State's National Collegiate Athletic Association triple jump champion.

'What Kenny (Harrison) and I are attempting to do is to improve the normal U.S. situation. It should enhance his abilities enormously.'
— Steve Miller

Harrison doesn't shy away from talking about Miller either.

"He's a fantastic coach. He's really enthusiastic and that's what everybody needs," Harrison said. "You've got to have somebody out there who's going to motivate you and that's what Coach Miller does. He keeps you motivated and plus he's the best event coach in the country."

As for the world record, sure Harrison thinks about it, but he refuses to become a prisoner of it boundries.

"Life is life. That's what I'm pushing for — to break the world's record. If it doesn't happen it doesn't happen. It's just not worth it (to put a whole lot of pressure on myself). I'd hurt myself more than help if I went out every week and tried to break the world record. That's not how you go about it. Just take a little at a time and things will happen," Harrison said.

Harrison realizes that time can make a difference. As a junior in eligibility he is younger than those he is jumping against and it wasn't long ago that he was intimidated by his more famous opponents.

"I'm getting stronger and I'm getting older and those are the main things that help a triple jumper. If I can stay healthy, I think I'm ready to do some good things," Harrison said.

"At the Olympic trials I went to when I was a freshman, my attitude was, 'I'm just happy to be here.' I was in awe of those guys (for example, Banks and Charlie Simpkens), but after going through the year and competing against them, I've got a whole new attitude. Now I can just go out and compete and do what Kenny Harrison wants to do," Harrison said.

All of this success is shuffling Harrison's schedule around a bit. Instead of competing in the normal indoor season, Miller decided it would be best for Harrison to rest awhile and compete only in the Big Eight and NCAA indoor meets.

"We'll probably delay his season both indoor and outdoors to coincide with The Athletic Congress Championships. And we'll get him ready for the Pan American Games, the World University Games and the World Championships," Miller said. "We just can't start this early like we would with a normal college student or the year would just be too long."

As Harrison progresses, Miller plots the course which will further the success for the athlete he started coaching and who has grown into a friend.

"The key to coaching in individual sports is a personal relationship," Miller said. "The better your personal communication abilities are, the better opportunity you have to transmit ideas and thoughts.

"It started out as a coach-athlete relationship solely and it has grown into a highly emotional, very strong relationship between coach and athlete."

Parrish gives team new look

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Stan Parrish's favorite word has four letters in it — "team."

And the first-year K-State football coach knows that if his Wildcats can pull together, they stand a fighting chance of chalking up some victories this season.

Parrish realizes his Wildcats won't be able to line up one-on-one and blow anyone away, so he starts singing his favorite word.

"I'm still from the old school — we need a team here. We need everybody pulling together," Parrish said.

In his efforts to create a team atmosphere, Parrish ordered new uniforms for his version of Wildcat football. Gone are the soft grays and fancy designs of the Jim Dickey reign.

Enter the "Penn State" look of the Stan Parrish reign.

Everything is plain. The uniforms simply have the player's numbers on them and the helmet's purple is broken only by two white stripes down the middle.

And no longer will the players have their names across their shoulders. No, a true team doesn't need to know who is doing what.

"I'd be willing to put Kansas State on the back. I think (putting players' names on the uniforms) promotes individualism," Parrish said. "I think here we need a team.

"Little things like that bring you together. They create team. I think that's our shot (at being succesful)."

Parrish did the same thing with green when he coached at Marshall University in Huntington, W. Va., and it might have been part of the formula which helped him be successful with that losing program.

"I like them (uniforms) plain. I think they grow with an identity. I like the purple hats — they're bold and louder. They suggest winning and I'll do anything in my power that will give us an edge," Parrish said.

The uniforms, though, are just a piece in a master plan for turning one of the least successful football programs since World War II into a team people will take seriously. And the goal of the uniforms is to get his players to start using Parrish's favorite four-letter word.

"I think the kids need that. I painted the locker room. I put them in shirts this spring that were purple. Everything is purple and hopefully the fans will fill up the stands with purple," Parrish said.

The reception for the new uniforms hasn't been accompanied by a thunderous roar of approval. Some critics have even said the new uniforms will simply make a bad team look ugly.

"I think they look great. I know I'm in the minority. My (coaching) staff doesn't like them and I know the players don't like them."

It doesn't matter to Parrish if the whole world thinks the K-State football team looks like grapes, as long as his team starts obeying the definition of his pet word.

"They're new; we're new. It's a new start for K-State football," Parrish said.

'57 graduate initiates fan club in Nebraska

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

After watching his long-time nemesis, Nebraska, receive support from out-of-state backers at Cornhusker games, one K-State alumnus has decided to fight back.

Veterinarian Joseph Coyle, a 1957 graduate and now a Nebraskan residing in Omaha, wondered what this kind of support could do for his alma mater.

Coyle said he grew tired of seeing the banners and signs that adorned the Cornhuskers' football stadium with out-of-state support — Californians for Nebraska and Texans for Nebraska, for example.

So Coyle, along with other K-State alumni in Nebraska and with the cooperation of Craig Renfro, Catbacker clubs director and the athletic department's field representative, spearheaded Nebraskans for K-State.

"I ran it by a few others and we talked about it," Coyle said. "I finally did something about it.

"Californians for Nebraska and the others have a little more to cheer about. But I knew there was a lot of K-State people up here (more than 1,500 alumni) so I said 'Oh...if we could get some support for K-State.'"

Coyle wrote a letter outlining a plan for Nebraskans for K-State which Renfro sent in February to all K-State alumni currently living in Nebraska. The group had their first meeting June 6 in Omaha with 150 former K-Staters in attendance. Athletic Director Larry Travis, football coach Stan Parrish and men's basketball coach Lon Kruger spoke at the meeting.

The Wildcat support group now has 98 members who have contributed $25 each to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship fund for K-State athletics — a total contribution of $2,450 in six months of operation.

"I graduated in '57 from K-State so I have a warm place in my heart for the school," said Coyle, whose son Pat is a member of the Wildcat football team. "We talked about doing this for several years."

The support group plans to bus down to Manhattan for the Oct. 25 Homecoming contest against Big Eight rival Missouri. The athletic department will welcome them with scoreboard recognition and place their name in the program.

Coyle said the group is taking a "walk before run approach" by concentrating solely on the football team in its first year of existence.

"What we decided to do was to concentrate on one sport then branch out from there," Coyle said. "We want to establish a base first."

Renfro said the enthusiasm of Nebraskans for K-State has spurred interest from some K-State alumni in Dallas and New York. New Yorkers for K-State and Texans for K-State could be on the horizon, Renfro said.

"There is nothing that will be a better cure than a few more wins," Renfro said. "We will promote them (Nebraskans for K-State) and let others know what some of the outlying states are doing."

Talent deciding issue in Kickoff grid game

By The Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — In the wake of what he calls "probably the most difficult week of my life" following the death of defensive tackle Willie Ryles, Alabama Coach Ray Perkins says that talent rather than emotion will decide Wednesday night's season-opening Kickoff Classic against Ohio State.

"I don't think you can play a football game on emotion. I believe in intensity a lot more than I do in emotion," Perkins said Monday.

Ryles, who was slated to be a starter, collapsed during practice Aug. 17 and died Saturday of a blood clot on the brain. Perkins discounted any "Win one for Willie" atmosphere surrounding his team, which is ranked fifth in the Associated Press preseason poll.

"I never worry about a team being overcharged for a game," he said. "I don't think anyone can stay on an emotional high for 60 minutes. At some point in time, talent has to take over."

Alabama's woes began last April when running back George Scruggs died in an automobile accident which also left starting cornerback Vernon Wilkinson sidelined for the season.

Offensive tackle Gary Otten, who was out all last year, reinjured his knee in practice and will miss the Kickoff Classic. Cornelius Bennett, one of the nation's top linebackers, is out with a pulled hamstring and strong safeties Rory Turner and Shon Lee went down with a knee and elbow, respectively.

Nevertheless, the Crimson Tide has had what Perkins called "a good training period. I think under the circumstances our players have shown an exceptional amount of class and character and fortitude and stickability, whatever you want to call it.

"I'm exceptionally proud of the way our players have handled things, over the course of the last week especially. There've been some tough times and some sad times for our football team, but I think we've prepared as well as we can prepare."

Ninth-ranked Ohio State also has had its share of preseason problems and distractions. Last Thursday, Coach Earle Bruce kicked starting free safety Terry White and backup tailback Roman Bates off the squad and suspended starting linebacker Derek Isaman for one game for violating undisclosed "team regulations."

"We've had some injuries, we've had some suspensions, we've had some things happen," Bruce said.

Fighting Irish star might miss season

By The Associated Press

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Notre Dame basketball star David Rivers, injured in a weekend automobile accident, might not recover in time to play in the 1986-87 season, a surgeon said Monday.

Rivers, a guard who transformed a sluggish team into a fast-breaking one in his first two years, was listed in stable condition after surgery for a severe abdominal cut suffered in the accident Sunday, said a spokeswoman for Elkhart General Hospital, located about 20 miles east of South Bend.

Spokeswoman Barbara Barrett said Dr. Kirby Gross, the surgeon who operated on Rivers, predicted a complete recovery but said his return for the coming season was questionable.

"He said (Rivers) will definitely be able to play, but it's really too soon to tell how soon he'll be back, whether it's this season or not," Barrett said.

"(Dr. Kirby) doesn't forsee any long-term disability," she said.

Notre Dame coach Digger Phelps said Rivers' recovery is the highest priority.

"As far as basketball, I'm really not concerned about that right now," Phelps said. "Knowing David, his will to live and his will to compete kept him going."

Rivers, 21, a junior from Jersey City, N.J., led the Irish to a 23-5 season last season, averaging a team-high 16.7 points per game. He scored 25 points in a 90-83 loss to Arkansas-Little Rock in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

Rivers was injured when a van driven by former teammate Ken Barlow went out of control when Barlow swerved to avoid an oncoming car about 15 miles southeast of the university campus, police said. Rivers was thrown through the windshield when the van rolled over, police said.

Barlow, a first-round NBA draft pick of the Los Angeles Lakers and later traded to the Atlanta Hawks, was treated for minor cuts and released, police said. Elkhart County sheriff's Capt. Dennis Bechtel said tests showed neither Rivers nor Barlow had used drugs or alcohol before the accident.

The two were returning to an apartment they shared while working summer jobs with a caterer, police said.

Rivers was expected to remain hospitalized for 10-14 days, university athletic department spokesman John Heisler said. Barrett said the threat of infection was the doctor's primary concern.

Rivers, who had struggled at times to maintain his academic eligibility, was enrolled for a full course load with classes set to begin Tuesday, the university said.

Bechtel said the accident investigation was not complete but said the van apparently was traveling at "a pretty high rate of speed."

Saberhagen-less Royals shut down White Sox

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Frank White's two-run homer with two outs in the eighth inning broke up a scoreless game and Scott Bankhead and Bud Black combined on an eight-hit shutout as the Kansas City Royals defeated the Chicago White Sox 2-0 Monday.

Chicago's Jose DeLeon, 3-3, had a two-hitter before Jorge Orta walked and White hit a 3-2 pitch into the left-field upper deck for his 18th homer of the year.

Bankhead, 7-7, worked out of two jams in his 7 1-3 innings, walked two batters and struck out four.

The Royals announced Monday that 1985 Cy Young Award Winner Bret Saberhagen, already on the disabled list, will miss at least one more week because of a sore pitching arm. Pitcher Al Hargesheimer was placed on the 15-day disabled list.

Alleged Libyan threats provoke U.S. response

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration, in response to alleged evidence of renewed Libyan terrorist plots, is prepared to launch another military strike against Col. Moammar Gadhafi, a senior official said Monday.

The official said the administration has put together contingency plans for such a bombing raid in light of signs that the Libyans have expanded planning and recruitment to conduct terrorist acts or inspire this sort of violence by others.

"It's our intelligence that he is still causing problems," the official said of Gadhafi. He said the administration wants to make clear to Gadhafi that the United States will not tolerate any further terrorist activities.

"It's a warning shot across the bow," the official said. But this official would say that only afterinsisting that he not be identified.

He said the administration had evidence the Libyans are broadening their terrorist planning beyond their embassy-like "People's Bureaus" to Libyan airline offices,

Another administration official, also demanding anonymity, said he wanted to emphasize that the administration's preparations to deal with Gadhafi have been going on for some time and "have not reached an alert status."

An inter-agency task force has been following Gadhafi's actions closely, he said. But the official also said that a new military strike would be triggered by a provocative act on Gadhafi's part against U.S. military exercises in the Mediterranean Sea or "firm, documented evidence" that he was involved in a terrorist act.

"We have not reached that threshold yet," the official said.

Just two weeks ago, President Reagan warned would-be perpetrators of international terrorism that he would not be shy about taking swift action, as the administration had done within days of the bombing of a discotheque in West Berlin. U.S. warplanes conducted a series of air bombing raids against Gadhafi's Libya on April 15.

The Wall Street Journal reported Monday that the administration had prepared a three-pronged program of military, covert, and economic actions against Libya, with the aim of pre-empting any terrorist strike.

The contingency plan also would be designed to foment political and economic dissent against Gadhafi's regime inside Libya, where tensions already are building, and to remind the strongman that new terrorist activity would spark a repeat of the April air strike by U.S. bombers, the Journal said.

The administration official seemed eager to confirm the report, calling it "very authoritative." But the White House would not deliver an on-the-record warning to Gadhafi.

However, House spokesman Larry Speakes, in Santa Barbara, Calif., with the vacationing President Reagan, did not deny that the administration had taken such action.

"The United States is prepared to take whatever action is necessary to prevent terrorist activity and would continue to do so," Speakes said.

"We have reason to believe that the Libyan state headed by Colonel Gadhafi, has not forsaken its desire to create terrorist activities worldwide and the capability is still there to do so," he added

Speakes confirmed that a high-ranking U.S. official was being dispatched to Europe to discuss with U.S. allies anti-terrorist planning and a possible tightening of political and economic sanctions.

Officials scrutinize revisions in latest draft of water plan

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The latest version of the State Water Plan, the second comprehensive revision of the original document enacted by the 1985 Legislature, is being scrutinized this week by the Kansas Water Authority at a meeting in Independence.

The current draft of the water plan, put together by the Kansas Water Office, was reviewed Monday and will be reviewed Tuesday by the 16-member Water Authority.

The authority is composed of state water experts and government officials and laymen representing the general public. Each year, the authority inspects the water plan before it is submitted to the governor and the Legislature. It has 11 members appointed by the governor and five ex-officio members. H. Philip Martin, a Larned attorney, is chairman of the authority.

After the authority reviews it and makes its recommendations, a final version will be submitted by the water office for authority approval at a meeting Sept. 22.

The original water plan, drafted in 1983-84, was expected to be a blueprint to guide Kansas' water use and development over the next five decades. It is designed to be revised every year, with emphasis placed on the most critical problem areas.

The first water plan viewed Kansas water problems from a statewide perspective and set the foundation for management of various problems by creating a dozen river basins. Within each basin, there is a detailed breakdown of problems and proposals to correct and manage those deficiencies.

The latest water problems in each of the state's 12 river basins are described in the new draft in depth, such as contamination in the Upper Republican Basin in the northwest corner of the state to the Neosho River Basin that stretches into Kansas' southeast corner.

In the latest draft, water officials are stressing the need to clean up and stop pollution of water around the state. While the western half of the state continues to face severe shortages of water, officials are trying to reduce pollution of remaining water resources, including contamination of rivers, lakes and aquifers.

Evidence of the management problems in Kansas became clear during a 1983 drought in the Verdigris River Basin.

When the rivers in the Verdigris River Basin went dry during the 1983 drought, Independence, Fredonia, Coffeyville and smaller communities experienced severe water shortages.

There were four reservoirs nearby that were full of water, but no procedure for the cities to buy the water for the duration of the drought.

Pollution problems are discussed in several individual basin plans, which were put together over the past 14 months in consultation with local advisory committees appointed by the Water Authority. Each basin's plan not only identifies problems but also suggests programs that state agencies should implement to solve them.

The committees identified two kinds of pollution: contamination from specific sites and contamination from sources such as mining, construction activity, the oil and gas industry, leakage of hazardous waste and runoff from agriculture.

According to the introduction of the water plan: "the number, location and severity of all existing cases of water contamination is unknown."

In the Upper Arkansas Basin, concern is high over the potential for widespread oil and gas contamination from leakage of brine into the ground water, according to Lee Musil, chairman of the Upper Arkansas Basin advisory committee. The Upper Arkansas Basin stretches from the Kansas-Colorado state line east into Rice County and includes Dodge City, Garden City and Hays.

In the Lower Arkansas Basin, which includes Wichita, key problems are pollution from sedimentation and industry, and potential water shortages, said basin chairman Art Woodman.

Other water problems cited in the report are moisture conservation — preventing the loss of rain-water from fields by using terraces and waterways; the filling in of lakes and reservoirs with soil from rivers and streams; inadequate water supplies; and rural and urban flooding.

The plan looks to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment to implement an array of programs that would identify pollution problems and develop ways to clean them up.

The plan also recommends action by the Fish and Game Commission, the Conservation Commission, the Division of Water Resources and the Kansas Water Office.

So far, the cost of the proposed programs has not been estimated. But Joe Harkins, director of the Kansas Water Office, said the Conservation Commission has asked for $500 million to pay for the agency's cost-sharing program which provides money to farmers.

their operation with a very high level of reliability."

RBMK is the Soviet abbreviation for light-water cooled, graphite-moderated reactors.

Legasov did not say how many reactors were involved, but an annex to the Soviet report indicated that 18 reactors of the Chernobyl design exist in the Soviet Union, including the damaged reactor in the Ukraine.

"About half of them are in a shutdown position to carry out the measures proposed in order to increase their safety," Legasov told reporters after making a five-hour presentation to more than 500 nuclear power experts from more than 50 countries.

The Soviets came under heavy criticism for providing tardy and incomplete information on Chernobyl, but they have supported the new system of international reporting.

The report presented on Monday catalogued a string of procedural errors by workers at the No.4 reactor near Chernobyl.

It said the reactor was brought down to low power on April 25 during a routine shutdown and a planned test of how long one of the generators it supplied, No.8, would keep going if its steam supply were cut off.

The test was designed to improve safety in the reactor, the report said.

The report, summarized earlier by Soviet officials, said similar tests had been carried out at the Chernobyl complex, which houses four reactors.

"The working program ... in accordance with which these tests were to be performed, was not properly prepared and had not received the requisite approval," the report said.

"Because the question of safety in these experiments had not received the necessary attention, the staff involved was not adequately prepared for the tests and were not aware of the possible dangers.

Emergency warning systems were also shut down, it said.

do all I can to make this a good year for K-State. I don't intend to let up."

President Jon Wefald said yesterday that Koeppe's resignation was expected by many people at the University.

"If you talked with people at the University, they would say they are not totally surprised," Wefald said, adding that a committee will be formed in about a month to conduct a national search for Koeppe's successor.

Wefald said he believed Koeppe announced his resignation at the beginning of the academic year so more people would be aware of it. As academic head of the University, the provost is responsible for the supervision of all the colleges and deans.

"The whole academic side of the University goes through his functional unit," Wefald said.

Koeppe's resignation will have no impact on Wefald's ability to act as University president, Wefald said.

"These kinds of things happen. People come and people go. Nobody stays in a position forever."

enough to dissipate quickly and has such a strong odor that people would be alerted and flee.

Tazieff said it was much more likely that a large quantity of colorless, odorless carbon monoxide, released from beneath the lake's surface, hugged the ground, killing the villagers before they knew it.

Darrell Herd of the U.S. Geological Survey in Reston, Va., said that hydrogen sulfide was usually only a minor component of volcanic gases.

Three professors exhibit artwork

By JADA ALLERHEILIGEN
Collegian Reporter

Highlighting the work of three members of the K-State art faculty, the Union Art Gallery is exhibiting their drawings, paintings and collages through Sept. 12.

The faculty artists are Margo Kren, Duane Noblett and Karol Winegardner, all assistant professors of art that specialize in collages, paintings and drawings respectively.

"The works I'm exhibiting are works that were done 10 years ago," Kren said. "I found them this summer, and I desired to see them up."

Kren said she used the drawings in 1976 as one would use preliminary drawings; they were quick ideas and meant to be just that. This past summer she went through them and discovered the drawings were good in their own right.

Kren's original work ranges around 2 inches by 3 inches, but she would like to blow up the drawings to 6 feet by 8 feet paintings.

"This is an excellent opportunity for the faculty. In most exhibits we only get to display one piece of work but with only three participants we can show a more extended range of our work," Kren said.

Noblett began his paintings for the exhibit in February and finished in July. He has six oil paintings that show a symbolic reference to the landscape and to the world around us, he said.

Noblett combines numerous shaped elements into a composition with emphasis on recall or memory.

"My paintings relate to the element of recall. They are an arrangement of different colors that aren't displayed in a photographic way," Noblett said. "The paintings deal with personal reactions and flashes of memory."

The paintings show parts of highways, hills, roads, trees, signs and buildings.

"My paintings display the mechanical and organic items of our world," Noblett said.

Winegardner will display pastel and ink drawings which she has worked on and off with for the past year.

She said she was excited about the art exhibition because it gave the public a better chance to see groups of her work rather than a single piece.

"Throughout the year the entire art faculty will display their work together, but an exhibition with only three participants allows the public to see a group of my work," Winegardner said.

Winegardner's drawings vary in size from 15 inches by 20 inches to 30 inches by 38 inches.

"It is always nice to put your work up and hear comments from people," Winegardner said.

Agency slows welfare fraud

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Department of Social and Rehabilitation recovered $971,765 in fraudulent welfare payments during the fiscal year that ended June 30 — a 3 percent increase from the previous year, the agency announced Monday.

During the year, the department identified 2,149 cases of suspected fraud by welfare recipients, referred 281 of those cases to prosecutors and obtained 137 convictions, said Robert C. Harder, secretary of SRS. Defendants in another 71 cases were placed on diversion agreements, he said.

The SRS also filed 280 civil lawsuits to recover suspected fraudulent welfare payments and received 259 judgments against defendants. Harder said many criminal and civil cases still are pending in court.

In addition, the department conducted 19 "in-depth" investigations into suspected fraud by health care providers or social service agencies, Harder said.

The agency's welfare fraud hotline played a key role in helping to curb fraudulent payments, according to Harder. Of 2,169 calls the agency received on the hotline, 161 resulted in welfare payments being cut off.

Harder added that the department's Early Detection and Prevention Program, based in Wichita, Kansas City and Topeka, handled 2,884 cases of suspected fraud or misunderstanding of welfare rules. Payments were eliminated or denied in 986 of those cases and in 292 cases benefits were reduced, for a total savings of $484,300.

The savings from the welfare fraud hotline and the early detection program were in addition to the $971,765 in welfare payments the department recovered, Harder said.

Reagan studies change in U.S. budget process

By The Associated Press

SANTA BARBARA, Calif. — White House chief of staff Donald T. Regan, faulting the federal budget process as an inefficient, "Mickey Mouse system," says President Reagan is studying plans for a major overhaul of the nation's budget program.

Regan, in California with the vacationing president, said proposals to revamp the system put forward by top White House aides last week "definitely" caught the eye of the president.

The White House has found fault with the budget process for years, but has not put forward a specific reform package because of intense opposition in Congress, which jealously guards its budget-making authority.

The president would put his ideas before Congress in the next State of the Union address and make it one of his top priorities for his remaining two years in office, Reagan told reporters during a weekend meeting.

"We have a crazy hodgepodge of a budget," Regan complained. "No state has a budget system, no other nation has a budget system like we do.

"We do many things in the federal level that would be considered dishonest and illegal if done in the private sector," the chief of staff said.

Regan, the former Secretary of the Treasury, was head of Merrill Lynch, the nation's largest investment firm.

"We say receipts coming into a trust fund are receipts to the federal government and count to the budget or budget deficit. That is not right by any budgeting sense," Regan said.

The chief of staff said concern on Capitol Hill, in the past wary of such proposals, may change because of the $200 billion-plus deficits and the pressures of the Gramm-Rudman budget-balancing law.

"I think the atmosphere might be changing where people are saying, 'This is a Mickey Mouse system,'" Regan said.

He said the proposals included renewing a push for the balanced budget amendment.

Proposal may deter nuclear war incident

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — If the proposed summit between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev develops later this year, one issue that could be a key part of the agenda is a proposal for nuclear risk reduction centers.

Administration officials disclosed last week that Soviet arms control negotiators have expressed an interest in renewing talks on establishing such centers in Moscow and Washington as a way to prevent accidental nuclear war.

When the centers first were proposed in 1983 by a task force put together by Sens. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., and John Warner, R-Va., the Soviets rejected the idea, calling it a propaganda ploy designed to obscure the fact that no progress was being made on the larger arms control issues.

But Nunn, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said in an interview last week that the Soviets have changed their position because they now see the proposal as one which could produce an agreement between the two superpowers in the arms control area.

"Clearly, both sides seem to be interested in it," Nunn said. "I think really for the first time the Soviets see this as something that could possibly be agreed on at an earlier stage, while we are continuing to struggle with these other (arms control) issues."

Nunn said U.S. and Soviet negotiators will meet in Washington next month for a second round of talks on nuclear risk reduction centers, and he said those negotiations could "pave the way for an agreement at the summit conference."

The proposal has evolved slowly since it was recommended by the task force Nunn and Warner assembled to study ways to prevent the accidental outbreak of a nuclear war.

The Senate endorsed the idea in 1984 by approving a resolution 82-0 calling on the administration to pursue the concept with the Soviets.

After lengthy consultations with administration officials, Nunn and Warner took their proposal directly to Gorbachev last September when they were part of a Senate delegation that met with the new Soviet leader.

Two months later, Reagan brought it up with Gorbachev again at the two leaders' first summit, and they agreed to pursue the idea. Delegations from each country met for the first round of talks on the issue in May in Moscow.

Nunn said the proposal the administration has endorsed and presented to the Soviets is a scaled down version of the original concept, but he said it is "entirely consistent with what we felt it ought to evolve into."

Under the proposal, centers would be established in Washington and Moscow to maintain a 24-hour watch on any events that could lead to a nuclear incident.

The centers, using sophisticated communications linkups, would trade military and arms control information, such as advance notice of missile tests and troop movements and reports on detonations of nuclear weapons.

Nunn said the centers eventually could evolve into other risk-reduction areas, such as providing a forum for the superpowers to discuss how they would deal with the use or threatened use of nuclear weapons by terrorists.

Center uses programs to help students

Test, class aid mathematics study

By TRACY MAYHEW
Contributing Writer

Math is a subject many students have trouble with throughout high school and especially during college.

The Academic Assistance Center in Holton Hall Room 204 has coordinated two programs to help students have a better understanding of the subject.

The first program is a math placement test to help students enroll in the correct math class and the second is a study skills class.

The math program began when new students went to orientation in June and July. The Academic Assistance Center administered a math placement test to students who scored below 15 percent on their ACT test or students who haven't previously taken the ACT, said Judith Lynch, assistant director of AAC.

The test takes about 45 minutes, and its results show students which math class they are ready for. Any student can take the exam.

"We give this test so students can take the right class in the beginning instead of dropping out of a harder class," Lynch said.

Ninety percent of the students followed the advice and enrolled in a class for which the test told them they were ready, she said.

"The only negative response we've had is that some students are apprehensive about having to take a test and not being able to study for it," Lynch said. "Other than that, the response has been real good."

The center also coordinates the Learning Skills Seminar. This is a graded non-degree credit course that focuses on educational planning.

It gives the student basic study skills, helps them integrate these skills into the class in which they are having problems, and integrates these skills directly into a math class, Lynch said.

There are 17 sections of this class, and each class has 15 to 25 students. All students are enrolled in the same social science and mathematics course. The sections are taught by trained undergraduate students.

The class meets three days a week with each day focusing on a different skill. One day a week is devoted to general instruction in study skills. Another day focuses on specific strategies to use in social science courses. The third day is spent improving mathematic skills in the microcomputer lab, Lynch said.

"The results from this program have been excellent. After the course students have completed more hours and have received better grades. These students are more likely not to be put on probation," Lynch said. "We do everything we can to help benefit the student."

McCain Auditorium has interesting student job openings! House Manager, Concession Manager, Head Ushers, and Box Office Cashiers. Work study eligibility preferred. Please call 532-6425 or come by the director's office to make an appointment for an interview.

Tax bill holds opportunity for new pension recipients

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The tax bill awaiting final congressional approval contains a bonanza for millions of Americans who will be eligible for private pension benefits after working five years instead of 10.

The pension provisions also may translate into higher benefits for retirees, particularly low-wage people, and would discourage workers from cashing out their pensions before retirement.

The Employee Benefit Research Institute, a non-profit group that performs analysis, estimated that in 1983, little more than half the civilian workforce was covered by a company pension plan, 51.5 million workers out of 99 million.

However, 70 percent of the full-time workers were covered.

The broadening of pension coverage accompanied restrictions on Individual Retirement Accounts and 401 (k) retirement plans, two savings programs popular with middle- and high-income workers.

Key pension provisions in the tax-overhaul bill would:

—Require most companies to fully vest employees in a firm's pension plan after a maximum of five years, instead of 10 years.

—Expand the percentage of workers that a company must cover by establishing mathematical needs tests, ensuring that lower-paid workers are not discriminated against.

—Establish limits for integrating Social Security and pension benefits. People who receive Social Security and private pension benefits, especially lower-income people, could not have their pension reduced by more than 50 percent.

—Slap a 10 percent penalty tax on early withdrawls of pension money, and shorten the 10-year averaging period to five years.

"We think the pension changes are very significant and are some of the best features of the bill," said David Certner, a tax specialist with the American Association of Retired Persons, the nation's largest lobbying group for the elderly. There are 28 million Americans over 65, and they constitute one of the most rapidly growing segments of U.S. society.

Because of changes in the tax overhaul bill, the association said, it is expected that the number of Americans covered by private pensions between 2011 and 2020 will be 17 million more than under the existing system. And their benefits would be 22 percent higher.

While retirees' groups supported the changes in the trillion-dollar private pension system, small businesses generally opposed them.

Jim Klein, a pension specialist at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said the changes will take away the incentive of business to start pension programs, which are voluntary for employers.

Moreover, companies required to spend more money on pensions may cut back on other benefits, such as health and education, he said. "You don't make the (benefit) pie any bigger, you just slice it into smaller pieces."

Although more workers would be covered by pensions at retirement, Ellen Goldstein, a spokeswoman for the Association of Private Pension and Welfare Plans, said Americans should not be too rosy-eyed about the changes.

"We just don't think this is the answer to everyone's prayer," said Goldstein, whose industry-backed group supported some provisions but opposed others.

On vesting, for instance, she said workers who job hop every five years are likely to get very small benefits because the size of the benefits often depends on length of service and salary level toward the end of a career.

Still, more people will be covered, according to the institute's estimates, which showed that shrinking the vesting period to five years would have qualified 1.9 million Americans for retirement benefits in 1985 at a cost of between $1.4 billion and $4.7 billion.

So complex are the changes that companies would have to make in their pension systems that the congressional conferees suggested delaying the start-up of most of the provisions until Dec. 31, 1988.

Overhauling the private pension system has long been a goal of Sen. John Heinz, R-Penn., and Rep. William Clay, D-Mo.

Congress set up guarantees for beneficiaries of private plans in 1974 when it passed the Employee Retirement Income Security Act. Since 1981, lawmakers have tinkered with the private pension system.

Heinz has vigorously pushed for changes in the private pension system, which, according to the organization representing retired people, receives tax breaks worth about $40 billion annually.

"As a matter of national policy, we need to improve the odds for the average worker by bringing more people under pension plans and fitting pensions more effectively to the reality of today's mobile workforce," he said recently.

County picks ambulance director, hopes to improve service quality

By The Collegian Staff

Riley County Commissioners announced the hiring of Dan Morabito as the new director of the Riley County Ambulance Service last week.

Morabito, 36, will begin work Oct. 1, replacing Richard Kinsman who resigned in July.

Dan Harden, director of public works, said Morabito had the most medical credentials compared to other applicants.

"He's had a reputation as a 'Mr. Fix-It' man," Harden said.

Morabito said he hopes to upgrade and stabilize the present ambulance service. This consists of emergency medical technicians which he plans to upgrade to paramedics.

The upgrade will require a strong relationship with the Manhattan medical community, he said.

Morabito is currently director of Seward County Emergency Medical Services. Morabito, who is a registered paramedic instructor and emergency medical technician instructor, will receive a salary of $30,000 annually as the Riley County director.

In 1985 he won the Norman E. McSwain, M.D. Service Award for most outstanding achievements in EMS in Kansas.

"I've been interested in Manhattan for a number of years," said Morabito.

Morabito went on to say the Riley County Ambulance service has much potential and he is looking forward to coming here.

Official's threats spur operators' strike

By The Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — This is a true story about modern India. The villain is the telephone, taken for granted in much of the world, but in India regarded as an instrument of torture.

The leading man is a former Cabinet minister, once a powerful politician who defied Sikh death threats, but a man humbled by the telephone and a call that wouldn't come through, even at gunpoint.

Twenty-six hours and 20 minutes after booking, he got the call.

The leading lady is played by hundreds of low-paid, sari-clad, shrieking operators, described by the politician as "fat, lazy gossips, drinking tea in a lousy telephone system, the worst in the world."

Comparing themselves to Kali, the Hindu goddess of destruction, the operators went on a three-day wildcat strike, smashing switchboards, crippling service and demanding that the politician, former Home Minister Prakash Chand Sethi, be jailed or held as insane.

Some call the telephone melodrama farce, or soap opera, or morality play. The drama has not been played out, but this is how it began:

Last Friday at 12:50 a.m., Sethi, a member of Parliament, decided enough was enough. He had waited four hours and 20 minutes and made five pleas to an operator to get a top priority "lightning" call to Bombay from his home.

He warned the operator he was on his way to her office and set off with his son-in-law and three armed bodyguards, assigned to him because his life had been threatened. He was in charge of domestic security when the army attacked the Sikhs' Golden Temple in June 1984.

Sethi took his Czechoslovak-made, licensed revolver, explaining later that security rules "require me to hold onto my gun." Brushing past guards at the downtown exchange, the capital's telephone nerve center, the midnight raiders stormed to the ninth floor and demanded to see the offending operator, Miss Kiran.

"I am a public man with a grouse," he later said.

Then accounts differ.

Miss Kiran said she peeked from the ladies room and saw a man in a white pajama suit — drunk, staggering, swaggering and abusive — advancing with three guards toward the switchboard. She said she came out and he grabbed her arms, waving his revolver and blowing cigar smoke into her face.

"Do you know who I am? Do you want to live in this world?" witnesses quoted Sethi as saying. "I can buy girls like you for five rupees (40 cents)."

They said a male shop steward interceded, but the 65-year-old Sethi roughed him up and tore his clothes, then collapsed on the floor for 30 minutes. Miss Kiran bolted the exit to keep him there until police arrived.

Police charged Sethi with trespassing, disturbing the peace, using filthy and abusive language and assaulting a public servant on duty. He was not arrested.

Sethi says he was petrified when operators surrounded him and wouldn't let him go. Then, he says, the shop steward knocked him out. He got home at 3:30 a.m. Saturday and says a doctor certified he was not drunk.

But about 4,000 operators and staff disputed Sethi's account. By dawn they launched a strike, demanding his arrest.

Domestic and overseas bookings were paralyzed. Some emergency police numbers were dead. Other services were crippled. Women sat atop switchboards, twisted their headsets apart and shouted, "Death to Sethi!"

After 2½ days, on Sunday night the government announced the strike was over and Sethi had apologized, but many strikers denied it and so did Sethi.

Deere closes plants; UAW claims lockout

By The Associated Press

MOLINE, Ill. — A strike by 4,300 United Auto Workers at three Deere & Co. plants idled an estimated 13,000 UAW members Monday when the company shut down production at 10 other plants.

The union accused Deere, the world's leading manufacturer of farm tractors and implements, of locking out non-striking workers.

Deere denied the allegation, contending it was forced to stop production because the other plants receive essential components from two of the three strikebound plants.

No bargaining was scheduled.

Although UAW members were turned away at the 10 plants Monday, more than 15,000 salaried workers and members of other unions continued working at Deere's U.S. factories, including the 13 involved in the labor dispute, said company spokesman Bob Shoup.

"All indications are that it could be a long strike," said George McDanel of UAW Local 865, which represents about 3,500 workers at Deere's Harvester Works factory in East Moline, where UAW workers were turned away Monday.

The UAW ordered strikes Saturday at a foundry in Waterloo, Iowa; a components plant in Dubuque, Iowa; and a parts distribution center in Milan, Ill., just south of Rock Island.

The strikes involve were called after talks broke down Friday without a new contract for about 13,000 UAW members at Deere, which has been hit hard by the slumping U.S. farm economy.

Bargaining began April 7 to replace a 1983 contract that was to have expired June 1 but was extended twice.

"Deere's lockout action raises a serious question of whether management is shutting down its production ... to reduce inventory, but attempting to blame labor," UAW Vice President Bill Casstevens said from his Detroit office.

"We're not considering it a lockout," said Shoup. "We've been struck. If you strike three of our factories, you strike them all because we have one master agreement."

The average UAW employee at Deere earns $24.64 an hour in wages and benefits, Shoup said. The company offered a 37-month contract "that provided for increased wages and benefits," Shoup said, but did not elaborate.

Union officials said Deere refused to adopt a job-security plan for UAW members and wanted to eliminate cost-of-living increases in the proposed contract's first two years.

Report cites crimes occurring every 5 minutes

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Every four minutes and 55 seconds a crime occurred in Kansas last year, as the pace of violent crimes and property crimes increased, the Kansas Bureau of Investigation's annual crime report shows.

Violent crimes — murder, manslaughter, rape, robbery and aggravated assaults — occurred once every 61 minutes during 1985, according to the report, which was distributed at the Capitol Monday.

Meanwhile, property crimes including arson, burglary, theft and motor vehicle theft, occurred in Kansas once every five minutes 21 seconds.

And the pace of crime far exceeded that of arrests: Law enforcement officers last year made one arrest for a violent crime or property crime every 25 minutes and 33 seconds.

Those statistics translate into a 1.2 percent increase of crimes in both the violent and property-related categories from 1984, according to the report titled "Crime In Kansas 1985." The number of violent crimes increased by 6.8 percent and incidence of property crimes went up by .7 percent from the previous year.

Statistics covering violent crime in the report showed:

— Murder and non-negligent manslaughter increased 36 percent, from 89 in 1984 to 121 last year. About 58 percent of the murders and manslaughters were committed with a firearm and in 30 percent of the cases, the victim was a family member of the assailant.

— Rapes increased 8.3 percent, from 665 the previous year to 720 during 1985. Nearly 85 percent of the rapes occurred in cities with populations of 10,000 or more and, although victims may have been threatened, no weapon was used in 62.8 percent of the cases.

S. African chief says war begins

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Mangosuthu Buthelezi, the moderate Zulu chief, said Tuesday the brutality of those who killed a supporter's wife shows that civil war has begun among South African blacks.

In Cape Town, a regional council voted to integrate the last whites-only public beaches on the Cape Peninsula. Council member Neil Ross said: "God's own beaches should be for God's own people."

The government said it will end on Wednesday the special inspections of cargo being transshipped from Zimbabwe and Zambia, which have caused long delays. It said the 3-week-long "statistical survey" had served its purpose.

Buthelezi, chief minister of the KwaZulu tribal homeland and one of the country's most powerful black moderates, issued a statement expressing shock at "the cold-blooded murder" of Evelyn Sabelo, wife of KwaZulu legislator Winnington Sabelo.

She was killed and her three children were seriously wounded in an attack on their home Friday night by assailants using a hand grenade and automatic rifle.

"This indicates the lengths to which those who wish to make this country ungovernable wish to go in brutality and hideousness," Buthelezi said.

"It is un-African for women and children to be targets in a war and I am concerned about the extent to which this kind of crime will brutalize those who are at the receiving end. The black civil war I warned about has now materialized."

Buthelezi's opposition to political violence and economic sanctions has antagonized supporters of the African National Congress guerrilla movement and other militant opponents of South Africa's white government.

Cape Divisional Council members voted 11-3 to open all beaches under its jurisdiction to all races.

It oversees 20 beaches stretching along 70 miles of coastline, mostly in rural areas away from cities and towns.

The city of Cape Town integrated its beaches last year. Action by the divisional council means all public

Loss of funds forces closing of 10 courses

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Due to lack of contingent funds, 10 classes offered this semester by the Department of English have been canceled, said Henry Donaghy, head of the department.

Six composition classes and four literature classes were canceled because contingent funds were unavailable, Donaghy said.

"This summer we thought we would have to cut 20 of the composition classes, but in the end Dean (William) Stamey came up with $25,000," he said.

Donaghy said all the students in the six canceled composition classes were absorbed in the remaining composition classes.

"I thank God it wasn't 20 classes," he said. "There is no way we could have absorbed that amount of students."

The students enrolled in the effected composition classes were told Monday that they had been transferred to the remaining classes, he said.

"It's a colossal irony when you recruit students to come to K-State, and they get here and required classes cannot be had," he said.

Donaghy stressed that some of the composition classes now have the maximum enrollment of 26 students. That number, he said, is the highest enrollment each class can reach without causing major disservice to students.

"The high enrollment in the classes makes it harder on the teachers," he said. "The overlarge enrollments make the TI's (temporary instructors) insecure."

Donaghy said he believed the lack of funding was not the administration's fault, and added, "Stamey has been an absolute magician in getting money for us."

The money for the composition classes depends on what Donaghy describes as a "interdepartmental kitty."

No regular budget line exists for temporary instructors, Donaghy

State fund removal may close service

By The Collegian Staff

The Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service may be shut down because $24,000 in state funds will be withdrawn by July 1987.

Director Bill Arck said the state is "hard up" for money now, and social programs are usually the first to get cut.

The organization is funded by two grants — a $24,000 grant from the state of Kansas and a 11,000 "community grant." The community grant will be withdrawn as of December 1987.

William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, said his office is aware that state funds and eventually community funds are being withdrawn and the department is considering solutions to the problem.

He said the community grant will not be withdrawn until December 1987, so the service will still have some funds with which to work.

"We don't know as of yet how the program funds will be obtained, but the education services will continue," Sutton said.

"We are not overly optimistic that the center will remain as it is now, but we have a year to operate before anything will be definite," Arck said.

The center has two employees besides Arck — a graphic artist and a graduate assistant.

Arck said he presented a budget to the Board of Regents last May, but it was rejected. He said he feels the Regents concerns about decreasing enrollment diverted attention from additional allocation of funds.

Currently, some of the center's funding is used in newspaper adver-

Survivors flee village; researchers discuss disaster's cause

Soldiers bury more than 1,500 victims of gas leak

By The Associated Press

SOUBOUM, Cameroon — Soldiers, their faces covered with bandanas to mask the stench, worked Tuesday to complete the burial of more than 1,500 victims of a volcanic eruption of lethal gases.

Most survivors fled this mountain village five miles from the Nios volacano, leaving herds of long-horned cattle bloated and rotting in the fields of this west African nation.

In Nios, which had a population of 1,200 people, only one woman and her child survived, authorities said.

When the first group of reporters reached the stricken area in northwestern Cameroon, army units had buried most of the victims in shallow graves that pockmarked the countryside.

"If you had come two or three days ago, you would see corpses in the same way you see the cattle now," said Lt. Gen. James Tataw, the chief of Cameroon's ground forces.

On Thursday, at about 9 p.m., a volcanic tremor unleashed a huge bubble of gas that burst through the surface of Lake Nios with a thunderous clap, sending deadly gases over a 10-square-mile area where 5,000 people lived.

"The smell was like cooking with kitchen gas," said Chia David Wambong, a farmer in his 30s. "Everyone started coughing and spitting up blood."

In Geneva, Switzerland, the United Nations Disaster Relief Organization reported 1,543 bodied had been counted and others were being discovered. It said it had obtained that figure from the government and it was cross-checked with reports from private relief agencies. On Monday the government placed the death toll at more than 1,200.

Israeli army medical teams said the fumes also killed more than 7,000 cattle.

Tataw said relatives had buried many of the victims before his army units arrived Sunday, making an accurate count impossible.

A major concern was preventing an epidemic that could be bolstered by the decaying carcasses of cattle and other livestock. Tataw said bulldozers were en route to dispose of them.

Viewed from a helicopter, lemon-shaped Lake Nios had the reddish-brown color of the clay that had been churned up from the bottom. A few yards away was a small pond of brilliant blue water.

The lush green mountains and tropical forests appeared untouched.

Gideon Taka of the Ministry of Information and Culture in the provincial capital of Bamenda said word of the catastrophe did not reach Bamenda until Friday. He said the tragic delay was because "nearly everyone was affected" and the isolated region near the Nigerian border had no telephones and only dirt tracks for roads.

He said local authorities first learned of the disaster from a government official who was going to his home in Nios for the weekend. The official saw bodies along the road and when he became dizzy he turned back, Taka said.

In Nios, Taka said he found bodies in the yards. The victims "came out of their rooms and tore their dresses off because of the heat. They were mostly naked or half-naked. I opened one of the rooms and saw there was food in the dishes, which meant that, at the time, they were eating."

A U.S.-made C-130 Hercules of the Cameroon army that flew reporters to Bamenda also carried 16 tons of rations for survivors evacuated to the town of Nkaba.

Professor speculates on chance of volcanic gas release in U.S.

By DERON JOHNSON
Features Editor

Although the loss of life caused by the eruption of Mount St. Helens was minor in comparison, a K-State professor believes the deaths caused by the release of toxic gases from a lake in Cameroon may have resulted from the same geophysical phenomenon.

"The big eruption of Mount St. Helens on May 18, 1980, was triggered by an earthquake," said James R. Underwood, professor of geology.

So, apparently, was the expulsion of a deadly cloud of gas from volcanic Lake Nios that has already claimed the lives of more than 1,500 people. Although scientists cannot agree on the type of gas cloud, Underwood said it is common for a volcano to spew deadly gases.

In fact, at least 50 percent of a volcano's gas is usually water vapor. The other components may include methane, carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide, hydrogen sulfide or a combination of those gases, Underwood said.

"When the turbulence subsides, the gas, I would assume, would stop being exuded from the surface."

Some scientists have speculated that cyanide may have been the fatal gas.

"It's the first time I've heard of it, frankly, and cyanide gas is not commonly found in volcanoes," Underwood said.

He did say, however, that cyanide gas could have been produced by sediment on the lake's floor and that an earthquake could have stirred the gas and caused its release.

Although the western portion of the United States has experienced volcanic activity and earthquakes in the past several years, Underwood said little similarity exists between the volcano in Cameroon and those in the West Coast region.

"In Cameroon, they (volcanoes) occupy an intra-plate position whereas the volcanoes in the western part of the United States are related to plate boundaries," he said. "I don't see any parallels between our volcanoes and those in Cameroon."

Furthermore, he added, the specific likelihood of volcanic lakes releasing poisonous gas in this country is slim.

"You can't say that it could not happen, but a classic example of a lake in the caldera (crater) is Crater Lake in Oregon and there hasn't been any activity in the past several thousand years."

Senator to speak in South Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — U.S. Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, an influential Republican advocate of sanctions against South Africa, arrived here Tuesday for a 24-hour visit.

Kassebaum, from Kansas, is chairman of the Africa subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and contributed to the tough sanctions legislation approved by the Republican-controlled Senate earlier this month.

She is scheduled to give a speech Wednesday at a "Women of Our Time" luncheon sponsored by The Star newspaper of Johannesburg in honor of 84 South African women.

Emmy-winner Ted Knight dies, 62

LOS ANGELES — Actor Ted Knight, who won two Emmy awards for his portrayal of pompous and dimwitted newscaster Ted Baxter on "The Mary Tyler Moore Show," died Tuesday. He was 62.

Knight, who also starred in "Too Close for Comfort," was hospitalized last year for removal of a cancerous growth from his urinary tract. Earlier this month, he returned to the hospital for treatment of complications from that surgery.

His doctors ordered him not to return to work because he was not fully recovered from the surgery, spokesman Henri Bollinger said after Knight was released from the hospital for the last time. Bollinger announced Knight's death.

Knight won Emmys in 1973 and 1976 for outstanding performance by an actor in a supporting role in comedy for "The Mary Tyler Moore Show."

Family wins custody battle of bear

ROCKFORD, Ill. — Walter celebrated his homecoming by grabbing a well-wisher around the leg and trying to climb up the screen on the back porch.

But a bear who has spent three months in a dog pound gets cut a little slack.

Walter the bear cub had been the object of a custody battle between his owners, the Robert Althaus family of rural Sublette, and the Lee County state's attorney's office.

The state said the bear could only be kept in an escape-proof cage in a state-authorized and inspected shelter. Althaus says he has gotten such a cage and has formed a corporation, the Althaus Animal Refuge, to care for Walter.

In May, Althaus was fined $25 for possession of a dangerous animal.

But on Friday, Circuit Judge Tomas Magdich, ruled that Walter could go back home.

About 15 family members and neighbors were waiting when the animal-control truck pulled into the Althaus family's yard Monday. A banner on the new cage said "Welcome home Walter."

Officials ban smoking in hospital

ROCHESTER, Minn. — Smoking will be prohibited throughout the Mayo Clinic's buildings and affiliated hospitals within a year, clinic officials said in a letter to employees.

In addition to waiting rooms and hospital rooms used by patients, the ban also will apply to refreshment areas, lounges, conference rooms and offices of the clinic's 14,000 employees, the clinic said Monday.

"For Mayo to continue to permit smoking in its facilities would be inconsistent with our leadership role in the health field," the letter said.

Smoking already is prohibited in most public areas of the clinic, which has 28 buildings in Rochester and serves 280,000 patients annually.

Officials let Marcos stay in Hawaii

HONOLULU — The Immigration and Naturalization Service has decided that former Philippines President Ferdinand Marcos and his family can remain in Hawaii for at least another year.

Marcos and 87 others were placed on six-month parole status when they arrived here from Manila last Feb. 26 after he left office in the face of growing rebellion. That parole expires Tuesday.

William H. Craig, INS district director here, said he decided to authorize a new one-year parole rather than a six-month extension as a matter of convenience to the Marcoses, who are living in a rented beachfront home in Honolulu's Niu Valley area.

Two die in runaway train collision

STRATTON, Colo. — Two crew members were killed when their train plowed head-on into an engine-less train that had rolled away from a grain elevator 30 miles west of here, authorities said Tuesday.

The 12 or more grain cars apparently got loose from an elevator in Arriba, picking up speed while traveling east on a steady downgrade, said Gordon Inglis, acting field chief for the National Transportation Safety Board in Denver.

Killed in the collision two miles west of here Monday night were the train engineer and conductor, both of whom were in the lead locomotive of the westbound Kyle Railroad train, said Inglis. No one else was aboard either train.

"It's unusual to have an accident like this, where there is that much damage and fatalities," Inglis said. "We have cars roll away a lot of times, but normally we have what we call a derailer that is supposed to be on."

He said the derailer in Arriba, which would have untracked the grain cars before they reached the main line, apparently was not in operation.

The collision occurred about 9 p.m. Monday. Grain and twisted metal were scattered over a wide area and wreckage was piled dozens of feet high.

KU officials announce fall enrollment record

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Fall semester classes opened with a record first-day enrollment of 25,599 this week at the University of Kansas.

The first-day figure represents an increase of 939 over last fall — when the old record of 24,660 was set, the KU Department of Educational Services said Tuesday.

The first-day figure for the Lawrence campus and off-campus facilities, such as the Regents Center in Overland Park and the Capital Complex in Topeka, was 23,256 — an increase from last year's 22,428. The enrollment at the Lawrence campus was 21,841 on the first day of classes.

The count at the KU Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan., was 2,343 — an increase of 111 over the start of the fall semester in 1985.

First-day figures may indicate enrollment trends but are not official. The official figures used to determine the university's budget are based on the number of students enrolled on the 20th day of classes and the number of course hours they are taking.

The school's administrators refused to speculate on how large enrollment will be at the time of the official tally.

"We may find that a higher percentage of our students enroll before the start of classes and that fewer students are enrolling during the late enrollment period," said Robin Eversole, the director of university relations.

Missouri senators split on tax proposal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. John Danforth of Missouri is leading the opposition to a proposed overhaul of the nation's income tax system — what he calls "tax reform run amuck."

A fellow Missourian who helped shape the legislation, Rep. Richard Gephardt, is fighting to pass it.

The two men, in many respects, represent the main political and economic forces, often in conflict, behind the tax reform effort which produced legislation that the House and Senate will consider after members return to work on Sept. 8.

For Danforth, a Republican, the legislation endorsed by congressional negotiators two weeks ago went too far in raising taxes on corporate America to cover tax cuts for individuals.

"All in all, it is a bill that is anti-growth, anti-jobs, anti-economic development, anti-future — all for the sake of immediate consumption in the form of a tax cut for middle-income people of about $200 a year," says Danforth, who served on the negotiating committee..

On the other side is Gephardt, a Democrat, who has argued that greater tax relief for the middle class should be a primary goal of any tax reform proposal.

For tax reform to succeed, Gephardt said when negotiators began their work, Congress must "get special interests, corporations and wealthy individuals to pay a greater share so we can get fair treatment for the middle class and lower income taxpayers."

It was this tug-of-war between corporate and individual taxpayers that powered the tax reform campaign from the beginning. By curtailing loopholes, credits and deductions, mostly available to businesses, lawmakers lowered tax rates.

The measure passed by the House last December boosted business taxes by $140 billion. The Senate version passed in June raised business taxes by $93 billion. The legislation endorsed by the House-Senate negotiators would raise business taxes by $120 billion over five years and cut taxes for individuals by a similar amount.

That Danforth should oppose the conference committee's tax agreement should come as no surprise considering his opposition to the House proposal, which he denounced as the "legislative equivalent of reckless driving."

"In my judgment, this is like eating our seed corn," Danforth said of the House proposal. "The future of the American economy relies on our willingness to forego a degree of current consumption in favor of investment and savings."

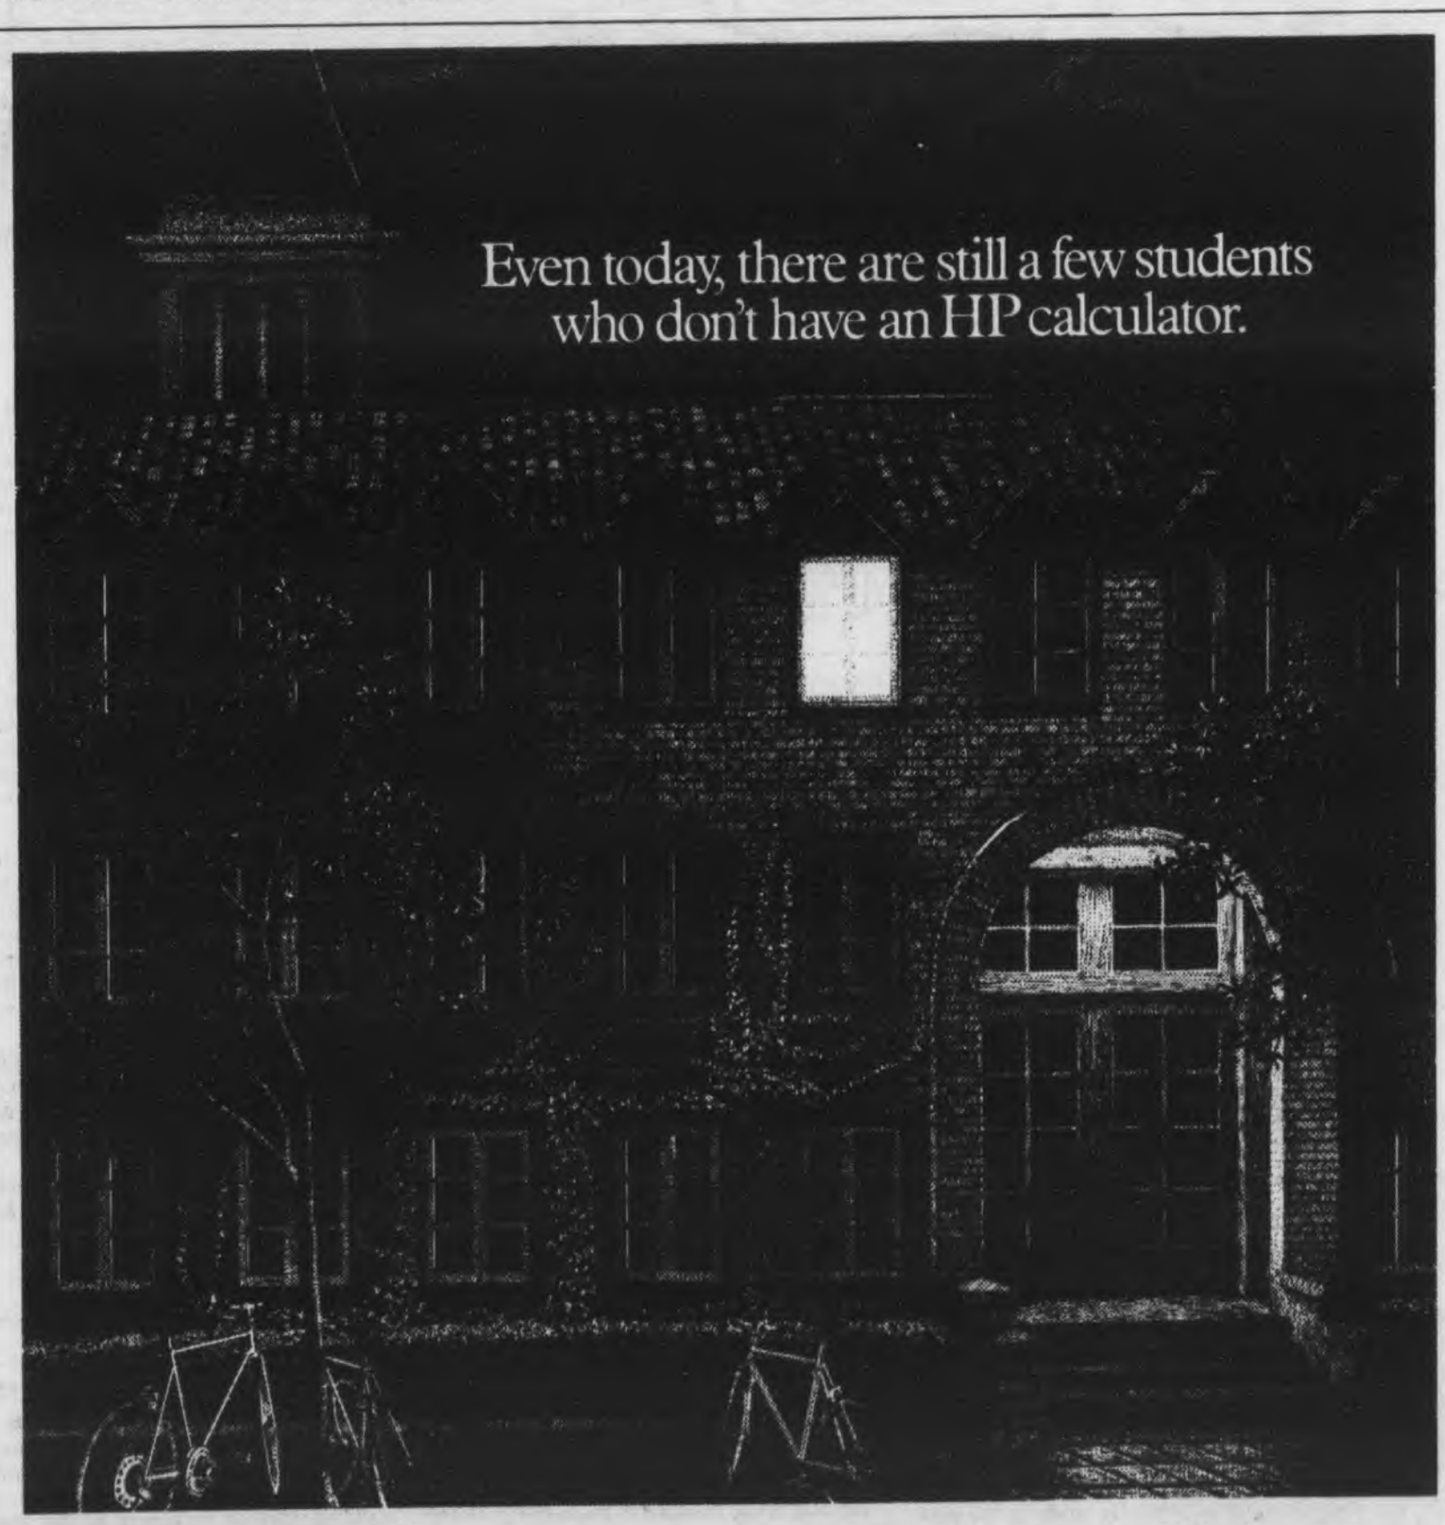
He argues that the conference committee proposal will most hurt capital intensive industries — those that have to frequently invest in new equipment and machinery in order to remain competitive.

In addition, he says universities and colleges will be hurt because of limits on tax-exempt bonds and reduced incentives for people to make private contributions. Finally, he says restrictions on the research and development tax credit will slow the advancement of U.S. technology. All of that, according to Danforth, threatens the jobs of many Americans.

Supporters of the legislation, like Gephardt, contend that the economy will be better off because fewer savings and investment decisions will be made for tax purposes. Others say the proposal will help boost consumer demand and stimulate the sluggish economy.

Gephardt describes the legislation as an "excellent example of what can be done in our country when we set aside our personal and narrow interests for the betterment of the common good."

Some have suggested that Danforth's objections to the legislation stem, at least in part, to losses of provisions that he personally favored.



For example, the proposal will increase taxes on defense contractors such as the McDonnell Douglas Corp. and the General Dynamics Corp., which are based in St. Louis, by altering an accounting method that allows the companies to delay paying taxes on profits from government contracts. McDonnell Douglas is the state's largest employer, with a payroll of about 37,000 people.

The senator's brother, William Danforth, is president of Washington University in St. Louis, an institution that would be hit by the legislation.

Danforth, however, has said he decided to oppose the bill because of broader concerns — the proposal's effect on the economy — and not the fate of his favorite provisions.

He explained it this way: "I knew if I jumped ship, my baggage was going to be thrown overboard. But even before I got to the railing, my baggage went over."

Especially when an HP calculator can get the answers you want — in time to get a good night's sleep.

For instance, our HP-15C Professional Scientific Calculator has more built-in advanced math and statistical power than any other calculator. Our HP-41 Advanced Scientific Calculators have even more potential.

That's because there are better than 2500 software packages available for them — more than for any other calculator.

There's even a special plug-in software package (we call it the Advantage Module) that's designed to handle the specific problems an engineering student has to solve in his, or her, course work.

No wonder professionals in engineering and the physical sciences widely regard HP calculators as the best you can get.

Proposed tax reform could harm students

After a long wait it seems that tax reform may become a reality. It has survived the onslaught of special interest lobbying and is on its way to becoming law.

Some of the big winners in this tax reform plan are the working poor. In the past, some people found it more profitable to go on welfare than to work. Under the new plan, a family of four can earn as much as $13,000 and pay no tax.

This is a big leap for the administration, which has received much criticism for its policies concerning the poor. This tax reform plan is a needed boost to get America working again.

While this tax plan is good for some people, there are many who will be hurt. Some of the biggest losers are the farmers. The new tax plan takes away the advantage of income averaging, a process by which a farmer that makes $60,000 one year and nothing the next can average his income and lower his taxes.

With the continuing farm crisis in this country, this new tax plan could be another nail in the coffin of the family farm.

Another negative effect of tax reform strikes even closer to home. Students with scholarships will now have to pay taxes on money provided for room, board and other incidentals. Only money used for tuition and required equipment will remain exempt.

This is a continuation of the Reagan assault on higher education. Along with his proposed cuts in university funding and student financial assistance, the plan is helping destroy the colleges and universities in this country.

Who does he expect is going to build and operate his "Star Wars" machines after he destroys the educational system? Maybe someone should remind him where physicists and computer scientists come from.

Tax reform is needed in this country. The government has now taken up the task of simplifying our tax code.

But remember that simpler is not always better. We must make sure that we get a better tax system that works, not some shiny new piece of junk.

Drug education loss could decrease funds

This University faces one more dilemma.

The Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service is facing the loss of $24,000 due to budget cuts, the same chronic educational "illness" which led to the resignation of University Provost Owen Koeppe Monday.

The funding, which will be pulled in July 1987, may force the important student service to close.

Even though the center is a small program within the University, its loss could have more impact than it might seem.

The loss will not only leave students less informed about the hazards of alcohol and drug abuse, but could leave K-State with less federal money.

Some congressmen are using the fiscal 1987 educational appropriation bill as a method for fighting the drug war on college campuses. If the lawmakers have their way, an amendment to the bill will block federal funds to universities that don't have drug prevention programs.

Maybe those who dole out the money will take a hard look at how the closing of the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services office will eventually have great impact on this University and society.

Center won't replace radio, TV equipment

A $1.5 million budget approval and newly appointed committee have made plans for proposed Educational Satellite Communication Center a reality.

The center will allow statewide, nationwide and worldwide transmission of programming via satellite uplink and will provide top quality studios and equipment for programming at the University.

With potential to communicate across the world, people who wouldn't normally have the chance to be exposed to the University community can learn skills and obtain degrees in such areas as veterinary medicine, and food marketing and technology.

Internships, part-time paid positions or class enrollment will be offered to radio and television production students who have completed basic core classes and have working knowledge of production.

The proposal to the Board of Regents in June acknowledged that student staff will be used. A subcommittee is looking at how course credits for students can be implemented.

In 1985, the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications, especially radio and television, announced the need for renovation and new equipment to update their educational services. Seminars on using the center's equipment can provide students with invaluable information and faculty with supplemental class lectures.

But the administration should not look upon the new communication center as the ultimate solution to the need for new equipment and facilities in the radio and television program. Funding is still needed for these students to gain the best education possible at the University.

Senior year brings attitude change

WAYNE LONG
Collegian Columnist

"Go to hell world; I'm a senior."

I remember seeing this quote on a T-shirt a few years back and not quite comprehending its meaning.

I wasn't sure if I should ignore this person or go home and start praying for the world.

What did the person wearing this T-shirt want from me? Money? Food? Sympathy? Beer? Congratulations? A David Letterman Late Night sponge? A Jim Dickey autographed football?

I recall staying up late that night thinking about being a senior and why anyone would want to wear a T-shirt like that one.

But now, I can wear one.

That is because, in exactly 32 weeks of class, I finally receive what I came to K-State to get: a diploma. In this amount of time, I finally get a return on the $4,800 I have spent on tuition, the $8,000 I have spent on room and board, the $1,200 I have spent on books and the few dollars I have spent on beer.

In nine months I will have accomplished what only one out of every four high school graduates completes: a college degree.

Hence, my attitude for this upcoming school year is different than I have ever had. Once again I am at the top, looking down, instead of at the bottom getting a stiff neck looking up.

How has my attitude changed? No longer do I need to worry about how I'm going to pay for next year. A graduate is supposed to be broke.

No longer do I have to worry about grades. A grade of "A," "B," or "C" stands for too much work. The grade "D" stands for Diploma.

No longer will I be able to convince my mother that I need new school clothes in order not to become a social outcast.

No longer will the automatic, state-of-the-art urinals in the Union make me feel like I owe them something for pulling the handle for me.

It won't bother me anymore that it takes three days, six flights of stairs and a map to find a book in Farrell Library. I simply won't go.

It doesn't bother me that we haven't used the lights on the football stadium enough to burn out any bulbs.

These things won't bother me anymore. I'm going to graduate in May, remember?

But don't think because I'm graduating I have forgotten all you underclassmen. In fact, I have a few words of wisdom for all of you.

To the freshmen, don't worry that you need a map to find your way around campus, most returning students will stop laughing if you try not to hide them.

Don't be embarrassed by the list of phone numbers your mom gave you in case you get in trouble; all freshman have them.

As you walk through campus in your brand new clothes with your shiny new backpacks containing two No. 2 pencils and a calculator, remember this is why other students are staring and it's not because you're handsome or cute.

To all the new pledges of fraternities, don't think all the sorority girls really care what house you joined, unless of course you own the frat where you are living.

To the sophomores, with a year experience under your belt, along with the 20 pounds you gained last year: don't get too cocky. In fact, while standing in line in the dean's office to change majors, remember that almost half of the students do so once. If this is already the second time, remember a college has no laws against taking five or six years of class.

To the juniors, enjoy. Never again will you be able to use the past to your advantage while not having to directly look at the future. Not that you might not have a few worries, like having your first date or passing your first class.

Seriously though, there is something for underclassmen to look forward to other than the next time your morning class is canceled. Just ask any senior you may see. Remember to have a little respect as well; otherwise you may never understand what that T-shirt really means.

Organizing time simplifies college

SUSAN BAIRD
Collegian Columnist

Welcome to another relaxing year at K-State.

"Relaxing?" you ask. "How can nine months of book work, headaches and general confusion be relaxing?"

After three years of intensive study, I have learned one thing: attending a university can be one of the most fulfilling times in an individual's life. It can be intellectually stimulating, fun and even relaxing.

The key to making college life all these things is organizing your time. If you don't learn this technique by the second week of classes, each semester could seem like an eternity.

I have developed eight tips that may help you organize your life, reduce your anxiety about college and prepare you for the months ahead.

— Take a reasonable class load. Seniors with an IQ of 170 may want to enroll in 15 hours of graduate courses, while transfer students may decide to carry a light load their first semester at the University. The main point is to carry a class load that you are capable of successfully completing.

Before finalizing your schedule, honestly assess your abilities and decide your academic goals for the semester. If you're afraid the class work might crush you, don't be afraid to drop a class. On the other hand, don't take so light a load that the semester offers no challenges. Find a happy medium in your class schedule.

— Introduce yourself to your professors and participate in class discussion. If they can attach a name to your smiling face, you cease to be another body in a lecture hall and become an individual interested in the professors' courses. This could be a definite advantage if you have a borderline grade at the semester's end. The professor may take into consideration your intelligent questions and sparkling commentary on a book during class discussion and give you the higher grade.

— Make a weekly schedule. For each week, make an hourly chart showing your classes and any meetings you must attend. Then block out study time for your subjects. Block out more time to study for a test or to write a paper due during the week.

— Utilize your time to the fullest. If you have extra time before dinner, review your Spanish vocabulary or chemistry formulas. Using spare time during the day to memorize definitions or review class notes could save you time and headaches the night before a test.

— Overcome the dreadful habit of procrastinating. I still keep putting this off.

— Ask for help. If you've failed to manage your time wisely or are having problems with your classes, ask an academic adviser for help. He or she may be able to suggest solutions to your problems.

— Make time for yourself and your interests. Being a student doesn't mean you have to be a bookworm. The University offers many ways for people to expand their knowledge about the arts, state and national government and world affairs. Take time to see a speaker at a Landon Lecture of Public Affairs or University Convocation, attend a performance by the K-State Players or hear a concert in McCain Auditorium.

— Get involved in campus activites. If you have the time and the interest, join a club in your field or a campus organization. But remember that students attend a university for an education, not a list of activities. It makes no difference how many activities a person lists on his resume if he hasn't done well in his coursework.

This list will not solve all your problems. Indeed, you should ask other students for tips on where to study, how to study, what classes to take and which professors to take classes under (and whom to avoid).

Your success — or failure — depends on you. Don't overestimate your abilities, but do have confidence in yourself.

Solution to parking

Editor,

It is interesting to note that there is an ad hoc committee currently studying the parking problem on campus. It is certainly a long-standing problem in need of study!

Administrative officials on this campus seem to have the perpetual attitude that parking for faculty and staff is a privilege. Wrong! It is not a privilege to park one's vehicle in order to get to work so that one can do his job. If a large corporation (or a small corporation) treated its employees like K-State treats its employees on the matter of parking, then they wouldn't have any employees worth a tinker's damn in short order.

There are in excess of 300 non-paying state and U.S. government vehicles parked in campus parking lots. The parking lots can only be constructed and maintained using revenues derived from parking permit sales. We pay those parking fees. The state or U.S. government does not pay for their own vehicles. They freeload in the better parking places at our expense. That constitutes discrimination folks!

It is only a matter of time before someone sues the holy heck out of the University over this matter. The University will lose because in this matter it has always been wrong.

You want more parking spaces available without added costs? You want them now? Put the government vehicles at the football field. Get them off the central campus. They never belonged there in the first place. That is obvious.

Change the parking regulations and put some teeth in them. Tow violators and fine them heavily. If they haven't paid for parking or they are parked where they are not supposed to be get their attention with stiff penalities. Make it not worthwhile to misuse what limited facilities the rest of us paid for.

The path to the solution of the long-standing parking problems on the campus begins with getting the priorities straight. Treat the employees of this place like the valued persons they are. Quit dodging the issue. Do the obvious.

Concerning student parking, it is rather odd that the administration seems to go out of its way to build a new coliseum that is of questionable need, yet they cannot build parking garages for students. Is it more worthwhile to build great empty halls, or parking garages? The students need a place to park, too. After all without them there is no reason for the rest of us to be here. It is all a matter of priorities.

Anne Moriarty, state lobbyist for the National Organization for Women, speaks to the local chapter of NOW Tuesday in Union 206. Moriarty explained her lobbying efforts in the Kansas Legislature during the meeting.

Abortion is top priority, lobbyist says

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Equal pay for comparable work has turned into a dead issue in the state legislature, with abortion now heading the list, Anne Moriarty, state lobbyist for the National Organization for Women, told members Tuesday night.

Moriarty, Topeka, was in Manhattan to discuss what is happening in Kansas regarding women's rights and issues. She spoke at a NOW meeting in the Union.

Hired last December, Moriarty's job was to design a legislative platform for NOW.

Her first legislative experience was not a pleasant one, she said.

"I couldn't have been more naive in putting it together," she said. "Our top priority was to be paid equity for comparable work, but from day one, the abortion issue was the top issue."

One of the bills that was considered would have required mandatory reporting of all abortions performed in hospitals, making abortion the only surgical procedure that hospitals have to report, Moriarty said.

Comparing the procedure to that of having hospitals report all vasectomies, Moriarty called the idea "ludicrous," and said the bill was "fortunately" killed in committee.

The bill Moriarty worked the hardest on was Senate Bill 577, written by Kansans for Life, which would have made it necessary for any girl under 18 to have parental permission for an abortion, she said.

Although current law in Kansas does not require parental consent for an abortion, the bill was difficult to lobby, Moriarty said.

"It was a long and bitter fight," she said, listing her greatest frustration as uncooperative witnesses.

"Doctors, judges and lawyers were appalled over the bill, but no one would testify for us," she said.

The bill eventually came up in the Senate, passing by a 40-5 vote, but never made it to the floor of the House. Moriarty said this was because members were running for re-election and didn't want to get involved with such a controversial subject.

Moriarty said she believes the lobbying was effective.

"I was astounded at what an influence the presence of constituents makes, but we have got to be more visible," she said.

"The congressmen do listen," she said, "but (they) believe what they receive in terms of letters, phone calls, et cetera."

In preparation for the next legislative session, Moriarty said NOW must put together a task force "so we don't go in totally unprepared the next time."

Even though Moriarty said she would rather not lobby on the abortion issue, she strongly believes that NOW must lobby.

"If we can't maintain control over our own bodies, then what do we have?" she asked.

Concerning gubernatorial candidates, Moriarty said Democratic candidate Mike Hayden couldn't have been more helpful to NOW during the legislative sessions, but when something came up on the floor, he "voted against us virtually every time."

Republican candidate Tom Docking, she said, was basically prochoice, but generally avoided the issue.

Although she supports Docking, Moriarty said either candidate would make a "fairly decent governor."

During the business portion of the meeting, Manhattan NOW President Sandra Coyner discussed the establishment of an anti-pornography task force, whose job would be "to find out what kinds of porn are sold and where, and to ask suppliers to remove it."

"We are not interested in censorship," she said. "This would be voluntary cooperation."

Stay in tune.

New wheat variety fails testing; officials cite stem rust problems

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

A higher quality and more competitive variety of wheat, called Sumner, was on the verge of being released for commercial production when its cancellation was recommended by Rollie Sears, associate professor of agronomy.

Weather conditions during the growing season contributed to the cancellation of the new variety, when it was proven highly susceptible to stem rust — a crop-destroying fungus.

Sumner appeared to be an ideal variety with a protein content 2 to 2.5 percent higher than Newton, a popular variety grown in Kansas, he said.

Sears, a wheat breeder at K-State, said protein content is important for breadmaking flours.

"Despite Sumner's good points, we pulled it back," Sears said.

He said it was known that Sumner, as well as other varieties already being used, was susceptible to stem rust. But Sumner has been proven more prone to the fungus.

"What you have is a variety that is super-susceptible to stem rust," he said.

Sears said when stem rust infects a plant it feeds off nutrients required by the plant for growth. When the fungus reproduces, it creates postules that literally eat holes in the stem of the plant, disrupting the plant's ability to regulate water and nutrients.

Fields that might produce 80 bushels per acre could be reduced to nothing by stem rust, he said.

Although the variety performed well in some parts of Kansas, including Sumner County — the area for which the wheat had been developed — the danger of stem rust was too great.

"Stem rust can appear anywhere in Kansas," Sears said. "Stem rust can wipe out an entire crop of wheat.

"In this situation, there was too much risk," he said.

This growing season was ideal for the occurrence of stem rust, he said.

A warm winter kept the rust farther north in Texas and Oklahoma than usual. That, combined with a warm, damp spring and summer in the state, made the fungus a problem for Kansas wheat growers this year, he said.

According to the Topeka Capital-Journal, 15 million bushels of wheat were destroyed by stem rust in 1986 after a virtual 20-year absence of the disease.

During the 12 years it took to develop Sumner, the Kansas Wheat Commission shared developmental costs with K-State.

Sears said "there is no way" to figure an exact cost for the development of Sumner because "hundreds of thousands of strains" are worked with each year.

This year's growing season didn't provide all bad news for wheat breeders, though. Two new varieties of wheat will be released for farmers to plant in 1987.

Norkan and Dodge, both developed at the Hays Branch Experiment Station, have been released for planting next year, Sears said.

Both varieties are resistant to stem rust, and Norkan has 1 to 1.5 percent more protein than Newton, he said.

Child cooperative's license to increase facility programs

By RONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

In September, the parents of KSU Child Care Cooperative hope to offer care for more than four times as many children as they are currently licensed to handle.

The cooperative provides service for all faculty, staff or students with children needing care.

Last year the cooperative had a licensed capacity for 50 children including infants, toddlers and preschool children. This year Nancy Bolsen, director of the cooperative, expects to have a licensed capacity for 223 children.

The cooperative, located in the Jardine Terrace L Building, is beginning its second year with new programs for infant, kindergarten and before-school and after-school care.

The new programs include bus transportation to and from school. The cooperative also provides snacks for the children. They are free to work on arts and crafts, play games or take part in planned activities. Supervisors are also available to help children with homework.

"This is really an exciting program," said Esther Gray, assistant director of the cooperative. "This gives the children an opportunity to unwind and relax after school.

"Outdoor play is on the schedule, and there is a park down the way. There are opportunities to visit many different places on the campus."

Cooperative supervisors who had been involved in innovative childcare programs in former positions, used their experience to implement new programs for the cooperative.

Lois Payton, the school-age program supervisor, worked with a similar program in Denver. Gray worked with a program for five years in West Germany.

"In Germany, schools close at noon. The children came to the center and there was a hot meal waiting for them. The noon meal was the big family meal, and it was important for them (the children) to be in a family setting," Gray said.

Gray said school-age children need a place to be where they can grow and form significant friendships.

"The parents (belonging to the cooperative) read lots of literature and spent hours discussing the type of care they wanted to see. They wrote a 22-page paper about their ideas. In the paper they discussed three philosophies they wanted to see," Gray said.

Those philosophies were introducing the children to several ethnic backgrounds, taking a non-sexist approach to teaching and reaching non-violent solutions.

"There are many children from different cultures here. It's a wonderful experience because if someone falls down and gets hurt, it makes them see that they are more similar than different," Gray said.

The cooperative is a non-profit organization with nine parents elected to act as voting members. One parent from Jardine is always on the board.

Parents pay a $25 annual cooperative membership fee, and they are required to donate one hour of their time a month to the program or pay a non-participation fee. The hour can be spent improving the playground equipment, building furniture or shelves.

They can also help the teachers in the classroom or help by calling other families on the membership list with messages. Other jobs are posted on the job board.

"Parent involvement at the center is phenomenal," Gray said.

The cooperative is funded from the parents' annual membership fee and weekly tuition rates parents pay for each child enrolled in the program. Tuition is based on family income and family size.

Recently, the cooperative received a $2,750 grant from the state and an $86,000 allocation from the Student Governing Association to help pay for the renovation of the building and operating costs.

Defense budget faces political fight

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — When Senate and House members sit down in the Capitol next month to try to work out a bill authorizing next year's Pentagon budget, congressional politics will be an unseen, but considerable, item on the agenda.

After Congress returns Sept. 8 from a Labor Day recess, the conference committee will begin the tough task of trying to reconcile major differences in the two bills passed in August by the Democratic-controlled House and the Republican-run Senate.

The main items of contention will be five arms control amendments added to the House bill, chiefly at the urging of Democratic liberals. They would:

— Freeze "Star Wars" spending.

— Ban the production of chemical weapons.

— Block testing of anti-satellite weapons.

— Suspend testing of nuclear weapons.

— Require continued compliance by the Reagan administration with the SALT II nuclear arms control treaty.

Another major difference is money. The Senate authorized $295 billion for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1 while the House voted $287 billion. Both figures were far under President Reagan's $320 billion request.

When the House conference members are picked, Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., is expected to give liberals, like Patricia Schroeder, D-Colo., dominance.

The leader of the House team will be Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis. He has been threatened with the loss of his chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee because liberals like Schroeder are unhappy with his support of the administration on issues such as the MX nuclear missile and aid to U.S.-backed "Contra" guerrillas fighting Nicaragua's leftist government.

Aspin helped fashion the arms control package that was attached to the House version of the defense bill. Those moves won him praise from liberals whose backing he will need when House Democrats meet to elect committee chairmen for next year's Congress.

Other Democratic liberals, speaking only on condition they not be identified, said they will wait to see what the conference committee approves before deciding whether to again support Aspin. They indicated his willingness to fight in the conference committee to sustain the House positions will be a key.

Normally, conference committees work by accepting either the House or Senate position on an issue. There are hundreds of differences in the bills, aside from the major arms control and total dollar figures.

The Senate conferees will be led by Sen. Barry Goldweater, R-Arz., who chairs his chamber's Armed Services Committee. Also among the Senate group will be Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., the ranking Democrat on Armed Services and one of Capitol Hill's most respected defense experts.

While Goldwater will nominally lead the Senate team, his poor health is one of the reasons he is retiring at the end of the year. Thus Nunn is expected to wield much of the real power in the Senate group.

Reagan has threatened to veto any final version of the defense bill if it contains the arms control provisions.

State should focus on processing, not food exports, professor says

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Pennsylvania State University professor says Kansas should focus on food processing to help revive its struggling rural economy, instead of shipping jobs out of state along with raw commodities.

Lowell Satterlee, chairman of the food science department at Penn State, made the remarks Monday before an agricultural task force of the Legislative Commission on Economic Development. The task force is one of seven panels appointed since the end of the 1986 legislative session to study ways to enhance the state's business climate.

Satterlee recounted the success of a food-processing center he started at the University of Nebraska when he was on the faculty of the college of agriculture there.

"Whenever you can stimulate food processing, do it," Satterlee told the panel.

The food-processing center in Nebraska helped farmers in western sections of that state to develop markets for potatoes, onions and carrots, Satterlee said. Those products were sold to a Campbell Soup Co. plant in Omaha that makes frozen dinners, he said.

One of the things that has damaged Kansas' agricultural sector is the export of commodities for processing, Satterlee said. In addition, the key to a successful food-processing industry is a close relationship among state universities, the state and industry, he said.

However, Satterlee cautioned the task force that getting the universities' schools of business, agriculture and engineering to work together on a food-processing project may not be easy at first.

For example, when he established the food processing center at Nebraska, there was almost 100 percent faculty opposition to the cooperative effort, Satterlee said.

But after some salesmanship, some persuasion and some successes, the faculty members became willing partners in solving problems food processors bring to the center, he said.

"You need to educate the business school people about agriculture," Sattarlee said. "The business school people don't know much about agriculture, but they do know about the business community out there."

After officials of the business school became involved in the Nebraska food-processing center, they were enthusiastic supporters of the program, he said.

Bookstore flips over modifications

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

As a result of rearranging at the Union bookstore, the upper floor will eventually be closed during slow book sale periods.

"All textbooks are now upstairs and non-textbook materials are on the first level," said Mary Lou Hutchison, manager of the bookstore.

A consultant, George Piper of Creative Designs in Franklin, Mass., suggested separating textbooks from everything else so that portion of the store can be closed during the slack period of textbook sales, she said.

"This method allows us to move, rearrange and restock our textbooks without the accompanying mess and inconvenience to customers that we have had in the past at the beginning and end of each semester," Hutchison said.

"Other benefits include better display, better use of floor space, reduced utilities when the upper level is closed for restocking, and less need to store textbooks in the ballroom on a temporary basis, since the books will go directly from the loading docks to the shelves, after being counted and priced," she said.

When the upper level is closed to the general public, employees will bring books downstairs for customers or access to the upstairs will be allowed on an individual basis, Hutchison said.

"The consultant, a 'store expert,' also suggested doing painting and remodeling in conjunction with the moving, rather than at some other time. So we got paint, brushes and other tools, and did all the work ourselves except some new checkout stands being built for us by a carpenter," Hutchison said.

"We did all the moving of fixtures and stock ourselves, as well as all of the painting and moving of walls," she said.

New computerized checkout stands will hasten checking out. Since the registers will be integrated with stock control, reordering and inventory will be streamlined. Having all of the registers together and near the office is good for employees, Hutchison said.

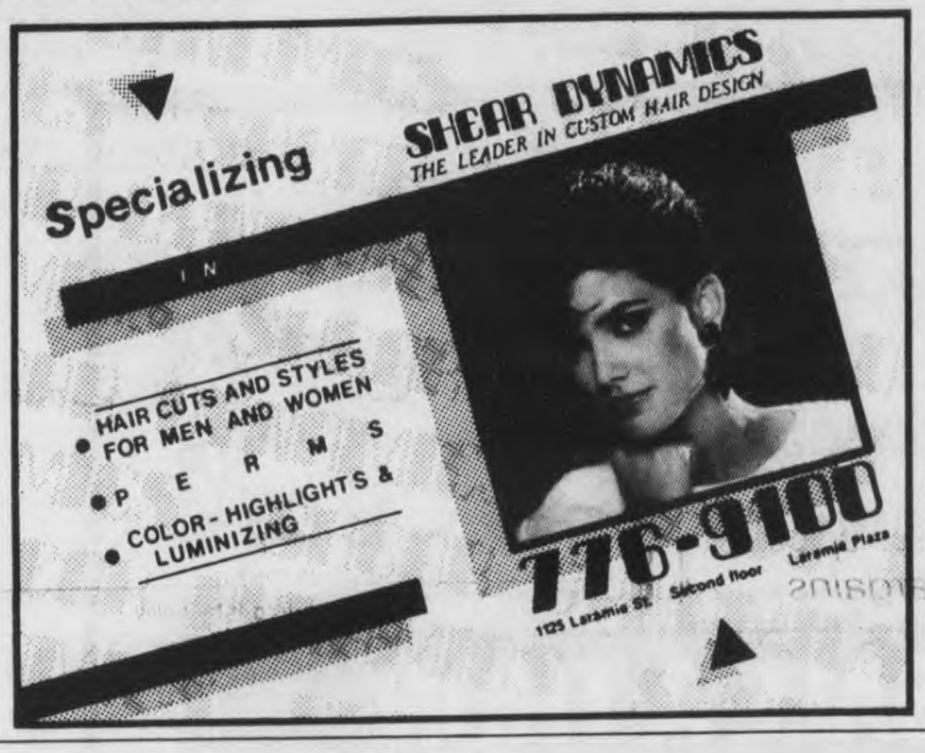
Hutchison became manager of the bookstore in May 1985, and the discussions about remodeling began almost immediately, she said.

After discussing the project at length with the store staff, a proposal was submitted to Union Director Walt Smith in January. After approval by the Union Governing Board, the consultant was called in and planning began.

The clothing department has been expanded and typewriters, videos and compact discs and more non-K-State gift items have been added. This will further enhance service to students, Hutchison said.

Banks decrease prime lending rates

By The Associated Press



NEW YORK — Three major banks lowered their prime lending rate effective Tuesday from 8 percent to 7.5 percent, the lowest in nearly nine years.

The nation's 10th-largest bank, San Francisco-based Wells Fargo, initiated the change, announcing its reduction late Monday. It was followed Tuesday by fifth-ranked Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. of New York and No. 9 First National Bank, based in Chicago. Many of the nation's major money center banks were expected to follow.

The move followed a cut last week — the fourth this year — in the rate the Federal Reserve charges member banks and other financial institutions for short-term loans. The Fed cut its discount rate, as it is known, to 5.5 percent from 6 percent last Wednesday.

The central bank has cut the rate in four ½-percentage-point increments this year.

By pushing interest rates lower, the Fed hopes to stimulate the nation's economy in the wake of continuing disappointing reports about its performance.

HOW CAN THE BUDGET-CONSCIOUS COLLEGE STUDENT SAVE MONEY?

a) Save over 50% off AT&T's weekday rates on out-of-state calls during nights and weekends.

b) Don't buy textbooks when "Monarch Notes" will do just fine.

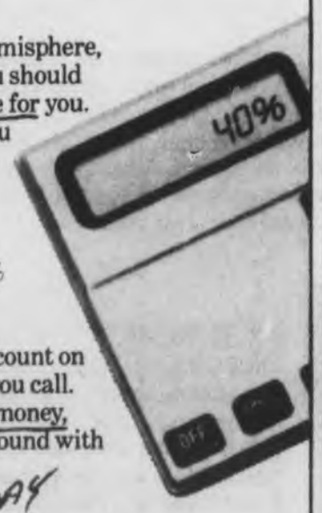
c) Save 40% off AT&T's weekday rate on out-of-state calls during evenings.

d) Count on AT&T for exceptional value and high quality service.

e) Hang around with the richest kids in school; let them pick up the tab whenever possible.

If you're like most college students in the western hemisphere, you try to make your money go a long way. That's why you should know that AT&T Long Distance Service is the right choice for you.

AT&T offers so many terrific values. For example, you can save over 50% off AT&T's day rate on calls during weekends until 5 pm Sunday, and from 11 pm to 8 am, Sunday through Friday.



Call between 5 pm and 11 pm, Sunday through Friday, and you'll save 40% off our day rate.

Ever dial a wrong number? AT&T gives you immediate credit if you do. And of course, you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections any place you call.

To find out more about how AT&T can help save you money, give us a call. With a little luck, you won't have to hang around with the rich kids. Call toll-free today, at 1 800 222-0300

'Manhunter' features psychic investigator

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Before judging the new movie by Michael Mann, I probably should admit that I like his "Miami Vice." I like it, but I regard it as a sort of guilty pleasure. The show is all too concerned with surfaces — in a way that makes actual human relationships irrelevant. But at the same time, the show's surface is so artfully composed that it's difficult to avoid its appeal.

Film Review

I approached Mann's "Manhunter" (based upon the best selling novel "Red Dragon" by Thomas Harris) expecting to find another "Miami Vice," but to say the movie is just a big screen version of what he's done on TV is dreadfully wrong. In "Manhunter" the visuals directly tell us what is happening in the mind of the lead character, Will Graham (played by William Petersen of "To Live and Die in L.A."), a forensics expert hunting down a psycho who only kills during the full moon.

Much of the story is familiar stuff, but the way Mann handles the material sets it apart. Will Graham isn't just another detective with a simple-minded, search-and-destroy mentality. Graham creates a mind-set similar to the killer's. This lets him visualize the killer's methods and motives; it also makes him susceptible to the same obsessive thoughts haunting the killer.

Detectives have always tried to think like the criminals they persue, but in the '80s, with so many vigilantes being passed off as police detectives, this approach seems fresh.

Once Graham establishes the correct mind-set, he oftens makes great leaps in logic that are downright telepathic. Other detectives remain skeptical of his claims, but he is proven correct time after time. These leaps in logic are precisely what the movie is about because they work as a metaphor for the way Michael Mann approaches filmmaking. He places a premium on intuition and sets rationale in the background.

This will open up his film to criticism from people who insist that a movie provide explanations for every twist and turn of the plot. But these people reflected by the detectives in this film who would've never caught the killer using logic alone.

On the surface, "Manhunter" might appear as a simple genre picture done up in art deco, but there's much more going on beneath the film's flashy veneer. Will Graham becomes a real flesh-and-blood character. He has a home life that isn't reduced to obligatory background information. One of the highlights of the film is the talk Graham has with his son; he explains his work so his son won't worry.

"Manhunter" is the film where Michael Mann shows himself to be a major filmmaker, not just a creator of TV fodder. And his film is a brilliant work of '80s filmmaking.

Road improvements funding uncertain

By The Collegian Staff

The Manhattan City Commission decided Tuesday to allow B G Consultants, Manhattan, to complete preliminary designs for the widening of Seth Child's Road.

But the governing body decided to delay further discussion on the method of funding the project until Sept. 2.

The city will approach Kansas Secretary of Transportation Jack Kemp, to try to gain half of the estimated $5.4 million needed to complete the project. The commission's past attempts to achieve financing by this method have been unsuccessful.

If the state again refuses, the commission may be forced to consider raising the mill levy an estimated 5 mills. However, commissioners plan to delay the request for funding until after the November general election.

"Kemp can tell us 'no' from now until November," Mayor Rick Mann said. "The others (Hayden and Docking) can't say anything until after November."

Another possible means of funding part of the project could come from additional money budgeted for the Southern Arterial project. Currently, $5.5 million is budgeted for the project, with $3 million coming from the state, the bulk of the remainder from gasoline taxes.

The bids for the Southern Arterial project's Phase I were about $100,000 below projections. The gas tax money can be used for any road projects, according to Commissioner Gene Klingler, allowing those funds to be transferred to the Seth Child's project.

Klingler said he would not commit more than 25 percent of the funds to come from the public sector for the project unless a referendum is conducted.

"We're talking about committing every taxpayer to 5 or 6 mills," Klinger said.

Cecil Kingsly, spokesman for B G, said the company has received about $96,000 of the $230,000 budgeted for the project, but needs about $60,000 to cover costs during the next few weeks.

The project would widen Seth Child's Road to a four-lane from Kimball Avenue south to Fort Riley Boulevard. It would also involve reconstructing the Wildcat Creek bridge to match the roadbed width.

The project would also widen the bridge over Anderson Avenue to four lanes.

According to traffic counts, about 10,000 to 16,000 vehicles use Seth Child's Road daily.

Current plans call for bridge designs to be completed by January, with bids to be sent out in February. In April, completion of the roadway design and final approval of the plan is expected, with bids for the remainder of the project to be sent out in May.

NBC names new president, eliminating 2-year-old void

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Robert C. Wright, a General Electric Co. executive with a background in cable television, has been appointed president and chief executive officer of NBC, GE's chairman announced today.

Wright, 43, replaces Grant Tinker, the chairman and chief executive officer of NBC who is returning to television production work after five years as network chief. GE acquired NBC earlier this year as part of its $6.4 billion acquisition of RCA Corp.

John F. Welch Jr., chairman and chief executive officer of General Electric, will assume Tinker's title of chairman.

"We have a lot of momentum," said Welch, who was flanked by Tinker and Wright at the news conference on Phil Donahue's set.

"This network is on a roll, we have a lot of money at General Electric; it would be crazy for us now not to pound home that leverage to widen the gap between us and the other players," he said. "And that is our agenda: to support these guys in every way we can, in as many avenues as they can, to take advantage of that number one position."

Wright is now president and chief executive officer of General Electric Financial Services Inc.

The title of president has been vacant at NBC since the departure of Bob Mulholland in 1984.

"What Bob Wright did at GE Financial Services is remarkably similar to what we are asking him to do at NBC," Welch said. "He took a dynamic, rapidly changing business in General Electric and increased its growth rate and broadened its base through acquisitions, partnerships, team building and creative, futuristic thinking."

Wright said his plans would be formulated gradually.

"My strategy will be similar to one I would use if I were taking over the New York Mets," Wright said, referring to this year's most successful baseball team. "I will stay with winning players, continue on a proven and winning course, and never for a moment cease to demand the excellence that Grant instilled in NBC during his stay."

Tinker, who led NBC from third to first in the prime-time rankings in five years as chairman, has indicated he would stay on for several weeks to smooth the transition. Tinker earlier made his mark in television with his former wife, Mary Tyler Moore, and their successful production company, MTM Enterprises.

Despite working in New York, Tinker kept his home in California and commuted on weekends. He has indicated he intends to return to production work after leaving NBC.

Brandon Tartikoff, 37, president of NBC Entertainment and the chief programmer, signed a three-year deal this summer which permits him to develop some movies.

Farmers agree to purchase Co-op

By The Associated Press

PARSONS — Troubled by the loss of the Labette County Co-op last June, 37 farmers have each contributed $5,000 to establish a new agricultural cooperative, according to its president Kenneth Froebe.

Froebe of rural Mound Valley said that the farmers agreed to purchase the former Labette County Co-op, which closed in June because of financial trouble.

For about $200,000, the newly formed group purchased office and grain storage facilities in Mound Valley and Dennis and the co-op's fertilizer plant just north of Parsons. That price, Froebe said, included all of the machinery and equipment at all of the facilities.

The new group did not have to assume any debts acquired by the former co-op, Froebe said.

Froebe said old debts were absorbed by the Labette County Co-op's major creditor, the Bank of Cooperatives, which also assumed the former co-op's stocks in Farmland Industries and other companies.

The new co-op, called Big Hill Co-op, is operating and is waiting for some final paperwork to be completed, said Mound Valley resident Ann Black, a member of the co-op.

"We're still getting some licensing done, but we're in operation now," she said. "And memberships are still open."

Negotiations for the purchase of the old co-op began in May when area farmers realized they were going to lose the Labette County Co-op.

Under the new co-op's rules, memberships are being accepted from farmers, who must contribute $5,000. So far, 37 farmers have become members, but Froebe said the organization was set up to accommodate up to 100 members.

Harold Henry, regional manager of Farmland Industries, said the type of memberships being accepted by the new co-op is common.

"It's not unique, really," he said. "The farmers are putting up money to re-establish the co-op.

"They went out and got local money to buy the facilities. And I hear they're excited in that area."

Many cooperatives operate under a different system, which establishes memberships to those who spend a certain amount at the facility in purchases. And Henry said many similar ventures include the acquisition of loans to establish the group.

Farmland produces many of the items offered for sale by the individual agricultural cooperatives across the United States.

The sale of the Labette County Co-op to Big Hill Co-op organizers was contigent on the approval of former cooperative members, he said.

"The local farmers who served as the board of directors at the local co-op had to vote to sell the equity," Henry said. The closed co-op's board agreed to the sale.

The new co-op's headquarters are in Mound Valley and Froebe said work was being done to help establish some storage facilities there.

A June 15, 1984, blaze destroyed an elevator and a feed mill at Mound Valley, causing about $150,000 in damage.

Froebe also expressed hope that the new co-op would not run into the same difficulties facing other cooperatives across the nation because of the ailing farm economy.

"There's a lot of hope," he said. "This territory was wide open for a co-op, especially with Kan-Ag in trouble and being all closed up."

Kan-Ag, which has facilities in Altamont, Dennis and Parsons, has been closed for several months as the company goes through bankruptcy proceedings.

said. Therefore, no regular positions are funded.

The dean of the College of Arts and Sciences must search for funds available from such sources as faculty on leave in other departments and direct that money to the temporary instructors, he said.

When the state did not budget enough money for the positions, the problem worsened, Donaghy said.

There were $86,816 in budget cuts within the college according to an Aug. 8 letter from the President's office.

"The contigent funds were just not there this year," Donaghy said. "It looked like we were not going to receive anything for the composition program until Stamey came up with $25,000. We need the state to give us the funds for required classes.

He said if the English department doesn't receive regularly budgeted funds for the composition program the cancellations could occur every year.

The English department was $75,000 short for the 1986-87 academic year at the beginning of the summer. Although they have received $25,000 since, they still remain $50,000 short, Donaghy said.

"If we don't get that $25,000 next semester, we will again be down 20 composition classes in the spring," he said.

The salaries of the temporary instructors for the composition classes are paid by contingent funding.

"Because of the lack of money for funding this program, many of the temporary instructors are going to be insecure about their jobs," he said.

The four literature classes canceled were Anglo Saxon Life and Literature, Western American Novel, Introduction to Poetry and an honors seminar.

Although these classes had low enrollments, Donaghy stressed they were canceled to allow for the budgeting of the composition classes.

These classes were canceled so regularly paid faculty could teach additional composition classes. If these classes had not been canceled, he said, an additional four more composition classes would have been canceled for a total of 10.

He said although these literature classes will be offered again in the future, the enrollment requirements will be much more stringent.

"This problem has nothing to do with the administration. I must compliment the dean's office in both informing the students about the closed classes and their ability to get the funds," he said.

Donaghy said he would like to see some changes in the budget process.

"I would like to see some regularly budgeted positions for the program," he said. "I can understand receiving some contigent funding, but not for the whole darn program.

tisements to increase alcohol awareness.

"We do a lot of the ads that appear in the Collegian, and we try to educate students on the responsibilities that go along with drinking," Arck said.

He said their current advertising efforts are outnumbered by the local bars.

"We run an average of one ad per week, and the bars run about nine per week," Arck said. "If the center comes to an end, then we will be outnumbered zero to nine."

Arck said last fall one-third less DUI tickets were given to students than in previous semesters, and said he would like to think the advertisements against drinking and driving played a part in it. During the 1985-86 school year four students from K-State died in alcohol-related accidents, he said.

Alcohol is the major drug the University deals with although other drugs can be obtained by students, Arck said.

"If our center is closed down, then there will be no advertisements run against drinking and driving and other alcohol-related elements," he said. "It will be up to the students to seek out information on alcohol and the consequences it could have on their lives."

beaches on the peninsula now are open.

The government's Bureau for Information released more details Tuesday about a confrontation Monday between police and a crowd of about 500 blacks at a high school in Soweto, Johannesburg's huge black township.

It said a 22-year-old black man was killed and eight blacks were wounded when four plainclothes detectives fired birdshot to disperse youths throwing stones at their car. The bureau said five wounded blacks, ranging in age from 14 to 25, were hospitalized in fair condition.

Bureau spokesmen reported one other death from unrest, a black man found burned to death Monday in the Zwide township outside Port Elizabeth. More than 255 people, almost all of them black, have died in unrest since a nationwide state of emergency was declared June 12.

About the border checks, a Foreign Ministry statement said: "The information gathered since the 4th of August is considered to be sufficient for the present." It said the exact reason for the inspections was confidential.

Former defensive end Kevin Humphrey, who left the Wildcats during last spring's practices, will return to the team this fall a few pounds heavier as a defensive tackle. Humphrey took a break from football so he could fulfill an ROTC scholarship.

'Cats welcome Humphrey back

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

When Kevin Humphrey left the K-State football program in the midst of spring practice, most Wildcat fans probably thought they had seen last season's Big Eight Conference Defensive Newcomer of the Year wear his purple No. 98 jersey for the last time.

What wasn't reported in the media or elsewhere was that the defensive tackle had no intentions of leaving K-State.

Humphrey was never unhappy with K-State or new Head Coach Stan Parrish, nor was Parrish displeased with Humphrey. In fact, Humphrey's reasons for leaving the team had nothing to do with football.

"Kevin had an early conflict of interest. He's very heavily committed to an ROTC program and his grades were suffering. He didn't know if he could do both (school and football). So I let him leave the program in the spring and left the door open," Parrish said. "He came in and talked, said he felt he could continue, wanted to be reinstated and I reinstated him.

"I never had a problem with him on the field. It was a decision he had to make. I'm glad he came back. He's a good football player. He's done an outstanding job for our football program this fall so far."

Humphrey's return, along with the presence of defensive tackle Jeffrey Hurd and converted linebacker now noseguard Tim MacDonald, has prompted Parrish to call the Wildcats' defensive front "probably the strength of our team."

Humphrey said his reasons for leaving the team involved priorities.

"I have other commitments," he said. "I was putting too much emphasis on football and not enough on grades. I also have a commitment with an ROTC scholarship.

"He (Parrish) understood that I had a lot of things going on, that I wasn't just leaving the program and going somewhere else," Humphrey said. "He told me he would still have a scholarship for me if I decided I wanted to come back and play football."

A change of position from defensive end to defensive tackle also played a part in Humphrey's decision. Humphrey, who is listed in the media guide at 6-foot-3 and 235 pounds, was being asked to gain weight as part of the switch.

"I knew I couldn't go to (summer ROTC) camp and gain weight and work out like I would want to," Humphrey said. "I was thinking about stepping out of football for a year and then coming back and playing after I got ROTC out of the way."

Humphrey's weight — he said he weighs approximately 225 now — still is a concern.

"With the type of defense we have, I could probably get away with it if we stunted a lot, but we don't," he said. "We do a lot of reading and try to keep the guards and tackles off the linebackers. When you're going 40-50 plays a game against a guy 270-280, that's a lot of wear and tear."

A quarterback sack specialist last season, Humphrey will be using different skills this year in Parrish's 50 defense. He recorded nine sacks to lead K-State and rank fourth overall in the Big Eight. His 77 total tackles put him fourth for K-State on the season. This year, he doesn't figure to get as many sack opportunities.

"They (the coaching staff) want me to keep the interior linemen off the linebackers so the linebackers can make the plays," he said.

Humphrey said the coaching changes of last season presented a challenge to him.

"It was a little difficult adjusting to the coaches. Having three coaches (former Coach Jim Dickey, interim Coach Lee Moon and Parrish) in one season, you learn how to work with one coach, then all of a sudden you get another," he said. "Now everybody pretty much knows what Coach Parrish wants. He talks to us, tells us what we're going to do and everybody accepts that and does their best."

If his best is anything like it was last year, K-State fans can expect a solid year from Kevin Humphrey.

Gator committee interviews Travis

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis interviewed Tuesday for the unfilled Florida University athletic director position.

Travis, a 1963 Florida graduate and All-Southeastern Conference gridiron performer for the Gator football team, was nominated to the Florida selection committee by a group of prominent alumni and boosters.

Travis was on the campus for interviews and meetings with Florida officials, the Collegian learned Tuesday. Travis is scheduled for several interviews today with school officials and those close to the selection committee.

"He went through several interviews today (Tuesday)," said Bill Elmore, search committee chairman. "He met the president, the provost, the development department, some boosters and myself, and toured the facilities."

Elmore also said Travis was scheduled for "several more" interviews this morning with officials in the athletic department.

Travis becomes the second of six finalists to interview for the job being vacated by Bill Carr, who is retiring. Late last week the selection committee interviewed Louisiana State football coach Bill Arnsparger, the only final candidate not currently an athletic director.

Elmore said the selection committee will also be interviewing the other four finalists in the near future, but no date has been chosen to pick Carr's successor. Carr said earlier he would stay on as long as needed until a replacement could take over.

"The last interview is scheduled for Sept. 10," Elmore said. "There is no deadline for the naming."

The committee also plans to interview David Wagner of Georgia Southern, Cedric Warren Dempsey of the University of Arizona, Fred Gruninger of Rutgers University, and Richard Young of Washington State University.

Travis also received his master's degree from Florida in 1969 and served as an assistant football coach at the school during that time.

He has occupied the athletic director position at K-State for a year and a half and has been instrumental in numerous changes in the athletic department during his tenure. Travis came to K-State from Georgia Tech where he served as an assistant athletic director.

Bending students' arms and shooting for sixth

TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Football Coach Stan Parrish is expecting a healthy crowd for Saturday's season opener against the Leathernecks of Western Illinois, but that just might be wishful thinking.

Sure, the support will be there from the locals and alumni, but it's Labor Day weekend and half the student body is going to leave town for home.

Students racing home to see mom and dad for one last weekend is just as much a K-State tradition as the football team losing.

I'm hoping that Parrish can change the latter of those traditions, but as for the former, I'm sorry, I don't think Stan is going to be able to manage that in his first year.

Don't get me wrong, I hope I miss on this one, but I fear the premier of Air Parrish might fly by unnoticed by much of the student body.

Talk about one growing boy — check out K-State's new noseguard, Tim McDonald. Last year, McDonald was the defensive captain and played linebacker. Last spring, Parrish moved him down on the line and told McDonald to beef up.

Now I thought McDonald was beefed up in the spring. The media guide lists the K-State junior at 6-foot-3 and 235 pounds; this fall McDonald reported at nearly 260 pounds.

Those who eat with him say it's an experience and those who face him this fall will probably say the same. McDonald was always fairly quick and the talk is he hasn't lost much of that speed.

McDonald is going to get a chance to put his size and speed to good use for the Wildcats. Indeed this K-State team should notch more than one victory.

How about a few predictions? Air Parrish can surely fly over Western Illinois and Northern Iowa and there is no reason his 'Cats can't take two from the likes of Texas Tech, Kansas, Missouri and Iowa State.

I realize six is the number Parrish is after, but K-State fans would be pleased as punch just to get four victories in his first year.

K-State fans are realistic. The purple and white hasn't found a man yet who can walk on water or raise the dead and they certainly are not expecting Stan Parrish to turn the K-State football program into a winner in one short year.

So, let's say K-State should have at the worst a 4-7 season. I wouldn't be surprised if things are better than that, but here is how I think the Big Eight will shape up when it comes bowl time.

At the top, Oklahoma. The Sooners in Parrish's eyes are one of the finest college football teams ever assembled. K-State will get the treat of opening its conference schedule in Norman which prompted Parrish to say he wouldn't mind if there was a cholera outbreak that week in Sooner-land.

Former Wildcats strive to say 'hello' to pros

Seven waiting for calls

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

For some former K-State gridiron standouts, life right now may seem like a modified version of an old game show.

While television contestants vie for romance on "The Dating Game," the NFL preseason professional football draft picks are playing "The Waiting Game."

And if the prospect is cut from training camp, the real fun begins — waiting for the chance to sign with another league or team.

Jim Fender is a sports agent who represents seven former K-State football standouts: Greg Best, Scott Fulhage, Barton Hundley, Jim Bob Morris, Mike Russell, Tim Stone and Steve Willis.

All his ex-Wildcat clients are playing "The Waiting Game" but, according to the Lawrence-based agent, some have the opportunity to sign with another team.

Fender said once a player gets cut from training camp, especially late in the preseason, then panic starts to set in.

"There are so few jobs in football, especially with the USFL situation, and naturally some of the players are going to panic if they get cut," said Fender, a Russell native.

Fender said he represents players that have potential to play in the NFL.

"Some of the guys I represent are better than the guys we watch on Sunday afternoons, but they're just not there because of luck, or the draw of the cards, or something like that," Fender said.

He also said that it is tough for a player that has been cut to stay in top physical and mental condition for another crack at the big leagues the following season.

"What is really in these players' minds right now is to somehow make enough money so they can afford to train for another year. All those stories about how pro athletes are hunting or fishing in the off-season is a bunch of bull. A pro athlete has to train every day if they want to make it or stay in the pro leagues," he said.

An update on the ex-Wildcats:

Greg Best, 1982, Def. Back

Played three years in the NFL with two teams, Pittsburgh and Cleveland.

Fender said Best is a "vested" player.

"What I mean by a vested player is that if he plays four years, he is eligibile for pension and other forms of compensation — a security vest. So in most cases the team will take someone else if they can," he said.

Best had a contract offer from the USFL's Memphis Showboats before the 1986 season was canceled. He now plans to coach in the Beaver Falls, Pa., area.

Scott Fulhage, 1984, Punter

Cut from the Washington Redskins after "winning the job" there.

"According to two Redskin coaches, Fulhage won the Washington job but they kept Mark Mosley as kicker and Steve Cox who can kick and punt. A lot of people over there thought they should have kept both Steves (Cox and Fulhage)," Fender said.

Fender said the Redskins traded veteran punter Jeff Hayes to Cincinnati, and that he had been in contact with the Bengals' staff to give Fulhage a tryout. The Philadelphia Eagles have inquired as well.

Barton Hundley, 1985, Def. Back

Picked in 10th round by Chicago Bears but was cut Aug. 20.

"We talked to every team in Canada and only one (Calgary) ruled him out. The CFL is primarily a defensive back league because it is a two down and throw league. Pass coverage is the No. 1 priority," Fender said.

Jim Bob Morris, 1982, Def. Back

Injured knee during 1984 season, now reportedly healthy and signed with the USFL's Memphis Showboats. Currently in Kansas City selling commercial real estate for the Lamar Hunt family.

"He has a lot of interest to play ball but his knee surgery is keeping him out. The (Kansas City) Chiefs' doctor said Morris' knee was the best reconstructed knee he had seen, but it is tough to convince other people of that," Fender said.

Mike Russell, 1984, Tight End

Released by Cincinnati but several Canadian teams are considering him.

"The coaching staff at Cincinnati said that nobody worked harder than Mike Russell...they loved him. They said that maybe in another year, or with another team, that he can play pro football," Fender said.

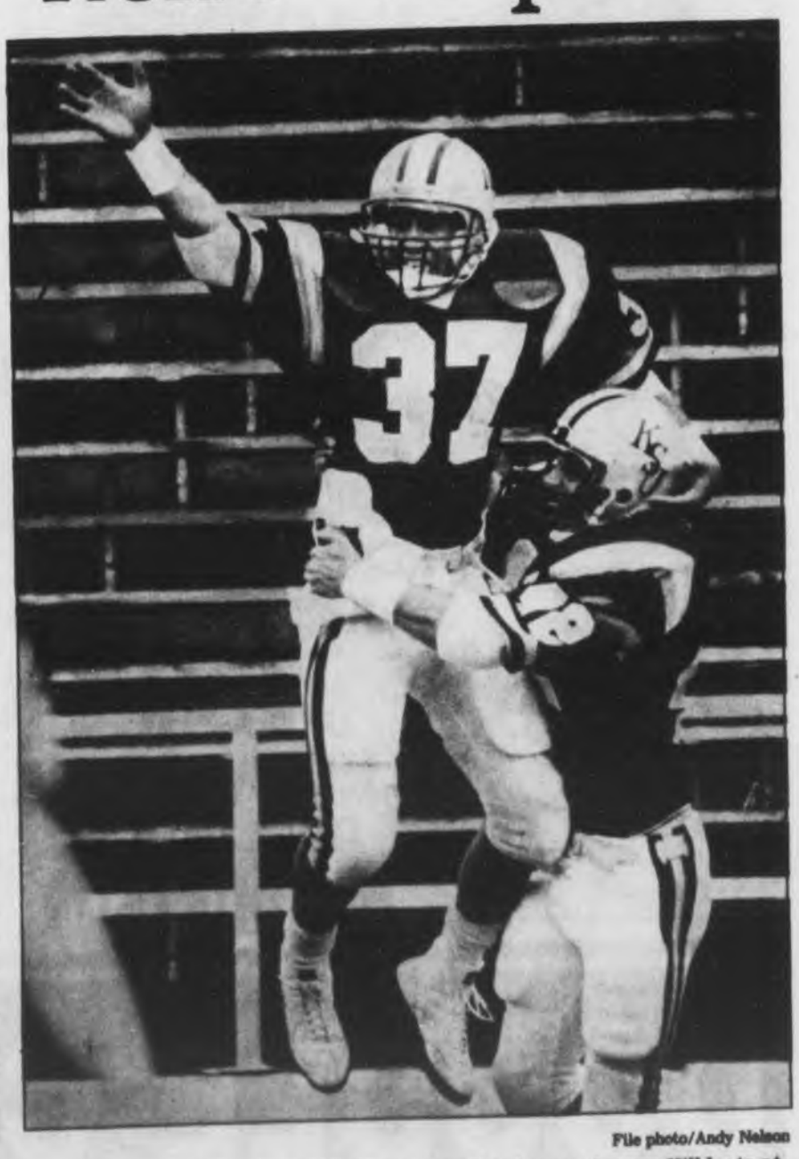
Tim Stone, 1985, Off. Tackle

Cut by Cincinnati after he shoulder injury in first day of camp. Has filed a grievance with the Players' Union against the Bengals.

"The Bengals' organization is trying to say that Stone had an existing injury and it is just there way of trying to get out of paying him. If he's healthy, he can make that team," Fender said.

Steve Willis, 1982, Kicker

Cut Aug. 21 by San Francisco; previously released by the Washington Redskins. New York Giants are showing some serious interest.



"The Giants were sick that they only got to watch him kick off once in the San Francisco and Los Angeles Rams game. Their scouts said he was exceptional in the pre-game warmup with his field goals and hang time on his kickoffs. They are waiting to see who else is put on waivers before making a commitment," Fender said.

Besides the seven former K-Staters, Fender represents former Kansas University players Willie Pless and Broderick Thompson, and three other players currently under contract with USFL teams. Pless was recently named lineman of the week in the Canadian Football League, and Thompson is a second-year pro with the Dallas Cowboys.

Fender said he doesn't plan to make a fortune from the K-Staters he represents, but hopes to give them a solid start in the pros.

He also said he only wants to accommodate 15 to 18 professionals, and give them more personal attention.

"One has to realize that an average stay in the NFL is only about four years," Fender said. "So as an agent, one has to do a lot for them in a short time."

Second, Nebraska — a team which normally would win the conference, but when you're battling the best team in the nation for your own conference title, things get a little difficult.

Behind the powerhouses, Colorado. The Buffaloes went 7-4 last season and tied for third in the Big Eight. Look for the same this year from the Buffs.

Either tied or behind Colorado will be Oklahoma State. The Cowboys are solid once again and will probably end up in a bowl game at season's end.

Next comes Iowa State in fifth. Controversy is swirling in Ames as the National Collegiate Athletic Association does some investigating of both the Cyclone football and basketball programs.

Sixth, that's right, the Wildcats. Air Parrish in my eyes is primed for some flying.

Seventh, the Missouri Tigers and second-year coach Robert "Woody" Widenhofer.

Last and least, the Kansas Jayhawks. I agree with Parrish, rivalries are healthy and at the end of the season I predict the 'Hawks will be buried at the bottom.

Bradley picks new coach

By The Associated Press

PEORIA, Ill. — Former Chicago Bulls Coach Stan Albeck signed a five-year contract Tuesday with Bradley University, a basketball program on probation for two years, and said no other college coaching job could have lured him from professional basketball.

"I can't think of a better place than Bradley, where I started 31 years ago, to wind up my career," Albeck said at a news conference at his alma mater.

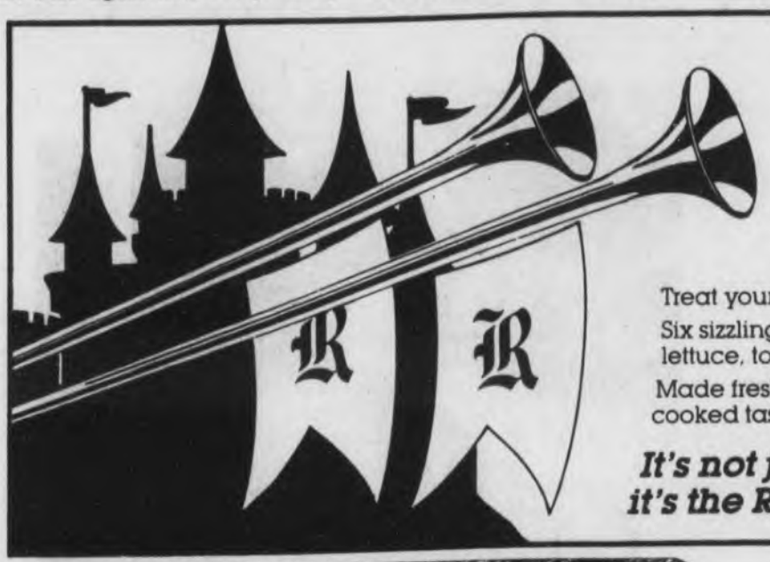
Albeck coached three National Basketball Association teams in six years before his most recent stint with the Bulls, who fired him in May after one year of a three-year contract that guarantees him $250,000 this coming season.

On July 14, Dick Versace signed a one-year contract for a ninth season at Bradley, but was told it would be his last because of NCAA sanctions imposed against the school that same day.

Chiefs cut roster to 50

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs Tuesday released 10 players, including Jim Arnold who led the National Football League in punting just two years ago.



The cuts, which included seven veterans, put the Chiefs at the National Football League roster limit of 50 players.

Arnold's departure leaves rookie Lewis Colbert, an eighth-round pick from Auburn as the Chiefs' punter.

Among the other veteran casualties were linemen Scott Auer and Bob Olderman; linebackers Jeff Paine and Louis Cooper, fullback Bruce King and defensive back Garcia Lane.

King and Olderman both opened the 1985 season as rookie starters, but lost their jobs as the season progressed. Auer also started six games for Kansas City last year in the Chiefs 6-10 season.

Wide receivers Chas Fox, a fourth-round draft choice from Furman, and Richard Estell, a free agent from Kansas, were released along with free agent tackle Matt Moran from Stanford.

Kansas GOP members adopt party platform

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Republican Party adopted its platform Tuesday for the Nov. 4 general election — a position paper called progressive by party leaders because of its appeal to minorities and advocacy for the arts.

The 14-page document sets out the issues considered paramount by the Grand Old Party in Kansas, such as traditional goals of improving the state economy through business development and protection of farmers and agricultural businesses.

It also reflects the party's tough stand on crime — the centerpiece of which is an endorsement of a death penalty for those convicted of first-degree murder.

What's new and exciting to Mike Hayden, the Republican nominee for governor, is the party's attempt to woo minority voters by inserting planks calling for divestiture of public funds invested in South Africa, advocating aide for minority senior citizens and setting a goal of selecting more minority judges.

"It differs from platforms in the past in several ways, especially in the way it deals with minority rights," Hayden said. "It's a very progressive platform. The truth is, we had the courage to call for these things, such as stating our support for a superhighway from southeast Kansas to Hutchinson. It's a great platform."

The platform convention was highlighted by speeches from its major nominees for state office, including Hayden who implored his Republican colleagues to work at the "grassroots level" to ensure his victory in November.

"This platform will be a good road map. It maps out the position of the Republican Party and will be very important as a guide as we prepare for the next legislative session."

Hayden was especially proud of the section designed to improve the living conditions and open new doors for minority residents of the state. And he pointed to the pages devoted to preservation of Kansas culture and art, which has specific proposals to establish a repository to catalogue information and art work by Kansas artists.

The platform called for expansion of the economic base as the state moves toward and "era of economic renewal." And in it, the party took full credit for writing and enacting the package of economic development laws which passed the 1986 Legislature.

It offers a little something for everyone and calls for increased spending in several areas.

Among its economic development goals, the party proposed "expanding state investment in the public infrastructure to improve highways, airports, water resources, recreational areas, wildlife habitats and state-agency facilities."

The Republicans want to "improve and add to our highway system" by building a "super road" from Hutchinson into southeast Kansas via Wichita while pursuing similar highway development in southwest Kansas.

Elevating the salaries of elementary and high school teachers to at least to the national average is another GOP goal, along with increasing the state's share of educational costs in an effort to reduce local property taxes.

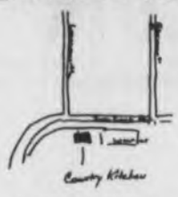
The GOP wants to expand tax exemptions for so-called stripper wells from three barrels of oil per day to those producing five barrels each day.

And the party wants to develop new programs to prevent drug and alcohol abuse, including drug testing "for certain segments of the population." The platform says "state government can help with funding and provide overall plan" to be coordinated with local anti-drug efforts.

Despite calling for a variety of expensive new programs, the Republicans wrapped up their position paper with a strong "no new tax" theme which includes placing a "cap" on state spending.

"We have led the fight ot keep taxes and spending down and we stand against the continued growth of government," the platform said. To that end, the party said its leaders should "avoid any additional taxation as long as the essential services can be maintained."

Any windfall the state might receive from federal tax reform should be returned to individual taxpayers rather than be used by state government to pay for its programs.



The platform convention was attended by a variety of state Republican Party officials.

County gearing up for reappraisal; new system to ensure fair taxation

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

With the passage of Senate Bill 164 by the 1985 Kansas Legislature, county appraisers are beginning the process of reappraising the entire state for the first time in 15 years.

According to the Kansas Department of Revenue, Division of Property Valuation, the reappraisal is the first step in an effort "to arrive at the fair market value of all property in a manner that is consistent from one property to another."

The department of revenue emphasizes the move is not to increase revenue, but to ensure that owners of similar property within the same taxing district pay the same amount of taxes. Reappraisal by each county is to be completed and implemented for taxation purposes by Jan. 1, 1989.

The basic change from the current system is in how property values will be determined, although assessments are to remain at 30 percent of determined value.

Residential property is to be assessed valued at fair market value. Appraisers are to consider factors such as exterior dimensions and square footage of the home, type and quality of construction, age, lot size and location.

Agricultural land is to be valued on its "use value," or the income production capacity of the land. The use value of the land is to be determined by the productivity of the land, the type of crops grown, and the income and expenses associated with the growing of that crop during the past eight years.

The department of revenue indicates that this system is considered necessary to eliminate the influence of speculation on the market value of agricultural land.

A report prepared by Barry Flinchbaugh, professor of agriculture economics, said use value is typically calculated "by capitalizing the net return of the land."

SB 164 uses an eight-year moving average of the landlord's net cropshare for farmland and the landlord's net rental income for grassland according to current usage. Both are capitalized at a five-year moving average of the contract interest rate on new Federal Land Bank Loans in Kansas plus an additional 0.75 to 2.75 percent, at the discretion of the Director of Property Valuation.

Sam Schmidt, chief appraiser for Riley County, said the county is "pretty much on schedule." He said final appraisals will probably be done by an outside firm, with bid requests to go out "in a couple of weeks."

Schmidt said the county's staff has finished deed research and research on previous sales in advance for the final appraisals. Having the county staff do the reappraisal in addition to existing duties would not be practical, he said.

All counties will be using IBM 36 systems with a software package approved by the state to ensure all counties would be operating equitably. Schmidt said this would be the major cost of reappraisal.

The new law requires checks on appraisal values on 25 percent of each county annually.

Schmidt said he is uncertain of the actual cost of reappraisal in the county, but information from the state estimates a cost of $23 to $25 per parcel.

The county will be using as many recent records and in-house staff members to appraise tax-exempt properties to keep costs to a minimum, Schmidt said. He said he could not give an estimate on the impact reappraisal would have on taxpayers.

Soviet officials lift ban on publication

Magazine prints Nabokov's memoirs

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — A small-circulation chess magazine has printed the first work by Vladimir Nabokov ever openly published in his native land, hailing the once-banned emigre author of "Lolita" as a master of language and metaphor.

Publication of a 2,000-word excerpt from Nabokov's memoirs in the magazine 64 came nine years after he died and more than 30 years after his novel "Lolita" became a sensation in the West.

It appeared to be part of an undercurrent of change in Soviet cultural life hinting at a rehabilitation of selected authors once suppressed by the authorities.

The most famous names mentioned in this context are Boris Pasternak, author of the banned novel "Doctor Zhivago," and Nabokov, who left his native Russia in 1919 to become one of the great authors of the mid-20th century.

Born to an aristocratic family in St. Petersburg, now Leningrad, in 1899, Nabokov became a U.S. citizen in 1945. He died in Switzerland in 1977 at the age of 78. Although widely read in underground editions here, Nabokov was dismissed by Soviet authorities for decades as a practitioner of "literary snobbism" and "distortions" of socialist heroes.

"Lolita," the 1955 novel about a man's obsession with a young girl, is still confiscated from travelers entering the country and is unlikely to be published anytime soon.

But in July, Mikhail Alexeyev, editor of the literary journal Moscow, said in a newspaper interview that he was seeking permission to publish "The Defense," a Nabokov novel.

Encouraged by what they perceived as a more open attitude toward Nabokov, officials at the chess magazine 64 decided to score a small cultural triumph and get another Nabokov piece published first, according to a source with close ties to the magazine.

They chose the safe theme of chess, one of Nabokov's favorite subjects, but at first had a difficult time finding a famous Soviet writer to contribute an introduction, said the source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The magazine published the Nabokov excerpt in its August edition with an introduction by the popular poet Fazil Iskander. The magazine said the excerpt was from Nabokov's 1954 book called "Different Shores" in Russian, which was published in 1974 in English under the title "Look at the Harlequins!"

The excerpt describes one of Nabokov's last days "in a dark and torpid Paris." His labor on a chess problem emerges as an allegory for his difficulties in getting his family out of Nazi-occupied France and to America in 1940.

Court order to protect children from divorce

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Judy Alvarez sat her 3-year-old son, Andre, down one evening and tried to explain that Daddy was going to be living in a different house.

A few weeks later at a court-ordered workshop on children of divorce, she discovered she had done the right thing to talk frankly with her child.

Since April, divorcing couples in Sedgwick County with minor children have been required to attend the workshop or equivalent counseling before a final decree is granted. About half of the 400 divorce cases filed in the county each month involve children.

Miss Alvarez, 21, a downtown Wichita office worker, said the workshop helped her address her fear and hurt feelings.

"When you have children, you're never completely divorced," she said. "There are ties. There are going to be times when everybody hurts."

Associate District Judge James Beasley, who issued the standing order requiring the workshop for divorcing parents, said he is seeking alternatives to the traditional adversarial courtroom process used in divorces.

"As adults, I don't really worry about them hurting each other. They'll do that and there's nothing I can do to help them," he said of the men and women he sees in court. "What I am concerned about is that in the process of hurting each other the byproduct of that is hurting the children."

He likened children to front-line warriors in divorce wars while parents are more like generals ensconced in a chateau, giving orders to lawyer lieutenants.

"The people who are getting emotionally maimed and injured are the little kids," Beasley said.

The Wichita Guidance Center, a non-profit agency that employs about 20 psychologists, therapists and social workers, handles the workshop. It costs $15 per person for the two two-hour sessions, but the fee is waived when participants can't afford it.

No therapy is involved in the workshop. Instead, lecturers concentrate on what happens to family members during a divorce and some of the emotional games they play.

"Divorce is the end of a marriage, not the end of a family. That's real hard to accept at gut level because it doesn't feel that way," Mardelle Moyers, a clinical social worker, tells her workshop audiences.

Children, who are never prepared for divorce and look to their parents for stability, "are affected emotionally more by how parents react to divorce than anything else," she said.

Dick Geiselhart, a psychologist, cautions workshop audiences about "Pain Games" that parents play, putting their children in the middle.

He talks about "Disneyland Daddies" and "Marineland Mommies" who react to their own guilt by trying to do or buy spectacular things for their children.

Workshop participants, who fill out evaluation questionnaires, generally indicate they appreciate the information passed along in the sessions.

"A lot of parents going through divorce are very caught in trauma themselves," said Patti Rizzo, clincial director of the Center for Kids in the Middle in St. Louis.

Residents join forces, pass recreation bond

By The Collegian Staff

The community asked for it and they got it.

Residents rallied for a bond issue to help pay for recreational improvements around Manhattan, so the "Quality of Life" bond issue was born, and in the Aug. 5 primary election, the measure passed.

"This has been straight from the community all along," said Terry DeWeese, director of parks and recreation. "This has been their (the residents') project since the word go."

DeWeese said the city is now in the initial planning stages for the improvements.

The city, he said, is looking for consultants, and said most of the projects should be done in around a year.

The $2.7 million bond issue passed with 60 percent approval of the voters.

The improvements planned include a sports complex; a larger facility for an animal shelter; renovation of the Community House, Fourth and Humboldt streets; construction of a pool at CiCo park; renovation of Northview pool; and a linear park.

The linear park will be a near 8 mile long area, providing a safe, scenic trail for cyclists and pedestrians.

Of the $2.7 million, the largest portion, $770,000, is slated for the sports complex. The complex will be built near Anderson Avenue, at the edge of city limits. The facility will have four regulation softball fields, seven soccer/football fields, a playground, picnic area, and fitness trail.

During the past summer, between 1,600 and 1,700 residents played men's, women's and co-recreational softball on 125 teams. Another 500 players, enough for another 40 to 50 teams were unable to play.

DeWeese has said with the addition of the softball fields, Manhattan will be able to host a state softball tournament.

Government volunteers little help to passengers stranded by airlines

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — While airline failures can leave thousands of travelers stranded and others holding worthless tickets on future flights, neither the government nor industry is showing much interest in offering help.

The shutdown of Frontier Airlines, which last weekend left an estimated 17,000 travelers with tickets but no airline to fly, is the third time since deregulation that a major U.S. carrier has suddenly closed down. Scores of smaller airlines also have failed.

Yet travelers who book on an airline that is in economic trouble are largely gambling, consumer advocates and travel industry sources said Tuesday. No airline is required to honor a failed air carrier's ticket and eventual refunds are of little consolation because a ticket holder is far down the list of creditors in a bankruptcy proceeding.

"When a company files bankruptcy, travelers are pretty much left to their own devices," said Hoyte Decker, chief of the Transportation Department's consumer office. "It's going to depend almost entirely on what other carriers are willing to do on a voluntary basis."

Last week, the American Society of Travel Agents called on Congress to create a $100 million revolving fund to be used to pay back travelers caught in an airline bankruptcy. The fund would be fianced through a 25-cent surcharge on each ticket until the $100 million figure is reached and be administered by the government.

But the agents and consumer advocates acknowledged that past efforts to establish such a fund failed and there seems to be little government or airline interest for the new proposal. The agents have yet to find a congressman to sponsor it and the Reagan administration has greeted it coolly.

"If this plan isn't implemented, there will be no plan at all," said Chris Witkowski, executive director of the Aviation Consumer Action Project, an advocacy group found by Ralph Nader.

In the often cutthroat competition among airlines a carrier bankruptcy "can hit anyone at any time" with travelers having no protection unless they buy a costly special insurance policy, he said.

Negotiations were still under way Tuesday to revive Frontier, a People Express subsidiary, but the airline said there would be no choice but to declare bankruptcy if no solution were found soon.

Historians remember 'Dirty '30s'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — When rains don't come and whirlwinds dance across the parched earth, someone sooner or later is going to call it a dust bowl, as descriptive a term as there is in agriculture.

But those who remember the early years of the 1930s, the Dirty Thirties, may recall that the real Dust Bowl was just that — a barren, empty place carved by wind out of parts of four plains states.

The August issue of Agricultural Research magazine published by the Agriculture Department says "what became known as the Dust Bowl was a relatively small part of the Great Plains, consisting of 20 counties located in the northern Texas Panhandle, Oklahoma, Kansas and Colorado."

Within the relatively small area, more than 8.7 million acres had been "severely damaged" by wind by 1937, and an additional 7 million acres had been "damaged slightly," the report said.

The author, Hubert Kelley of the department's Agricultural Research Service, identified the 20 counties as: Colorado — Baca, Bent and Prowers; Kansas — Grant, Hamilton, Morton, Seward, Stanton and Stevens; Oklahoma — Beaver, Cimarron and Texas; and Texas — Dallam, Deaf Smith, Hansford, Hartley, Moore, Ochiltree, Oldham and Sherman.

Hardest hit was Baca County in the southeast corner of Colorado, where more than 1.1 million acres were badly damaged by drought and wind, the report said.

Parts of the Dust Bowl were so desolate that some experts doubted the area could ever be reclaimed, that it would remain "a desert in perpetuity," the report said. But USDA scientists and field workers set about planting native grasses and taking other conservation measures.

In 1937, Arthur H. Joel, a spokesman for the Soil Conservation Service, was asked why the Dust Bowl occurred. He attributed it to the destruction or depletion of protective vegetative cover by cultivation, overgrazing, drought and other causes.

In the wind season that began last Nov. 1 and continued through May 31, about 8.4 million acres were damaged by wind erosion, according to SCS calculations. The agency considers land damaged when the effects of wind are apparent to the eye, a loss of about 15 tons per acre.

Agency patrols clubs for underage drinkers

JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Several arrests were made in Manhattan last weekend as agents from the Kansas Alcoholic Beverage Control Unit visited bars and clubs checking IDs.

John Lamb, state director of the ABC Unit, said the charges were for underage consumption of alcoholic beverages and for borrowed IDs.

In an Aug. 13 conference telephone call to the major Kansas universities, Lamb warned campus officials of ABC's intentions to visit bars and taverns and monitor parties in university communities searching for violators.

William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, took the call and relayed the message to many campus organizations.

"I think it would be unfair not to inform the students," he said, adding ABC would probably spend more time looking for violators at K-State, University of Kansas and Wichita State University than at smaller colleges.

Lamb said the arrests last weekend were part of a team effort with the Riley County Police Department.

Describing ABC's visit to Manhattan as "more of a visibility type thing," Lamb said enough arrests were made to "prove to people that they could be arrested."

The agents entered the bars and clubs in groups of two or three with one in uniform, he said.

Lamb said although ABC usually shows up more often at the onset of school "to help clubs and bars enforce the law," the unit will be back on a periodic basis.

"We will do a lot more checking this year than last year," he said. "Last year we more or less gave people the opportunity to get accustomed to the law, but now we will be much stricter."

Underage drinkers caught on a licensed premise are subject to a minimum fine of $100 and/or 40 hours of public service, with a maximum fine of up to $250, he said.

On non-licensed premises, such as a fraternity yard, the minimum fine is $25 and/or 10 hours of public service, with a maximum fine of up to $250.

For fake or borrowed IDs, the penalties are stiffer, with a maximum fine of $5,000 and up to six months in jail, Lamb said.

The penalty for a bar or club caught serving underage customers is generally a several-day suspension, but Lamb said he has an option of either suspension, revocation of license or fining the establishment.

"I will generally give the violator a couple days off, but it depends on their number of previous violations," he said.

Lamb said while Manhattan bars have set up a stamp system to identify customers who are legally able to drink and those who aren't, the bars still have a responsibility not to serve those who shouldn't drink.

"Just because they stamp someone with an underage stamp does not mean they are not liable if those persons drink," he said.

When asked about keg parties, Lamb said there was "no problem with that," explaining that the parties can be in front yards if 3.2 beer is being served, if the beer is not being sold and if no one under age is consuming the beer.

"If strong beer is being served, it must be strictly a private party, with no public access at all," he said.

Lamb stressed that if, for example, a fraternity charges a cover for an after-the-game keg party, then the beer is presumably being sold, which is illegal.

"We're not going to cruise around fraternity parking lots looking for keg parties," he said. "We have to establish some probable cause, but that's not hard to do if there's a large party going on, because of noise, parking and such."

ABC does have the power to enter private homes, Lamb said, but several criteria must exist for that to happen.

"No one is going to enter a private residence if a couple of underage people are sitting at home drinking," he said. "We've got more important things to worry about."

Lamb said if a party is in progress and there is probable cause that underage drinkers are there, they don't need a search warrant.

"What we try to do if possible is to shut the party off before it gets started," he said, in the event that there may be underagers attending.

One bar ABC visited last weekend was Brother's, 1120 Moro St.

Two young women were escorted out of the establishment by an ABC official and a police officer, said Geoff Gobble, assistant manager.

The women had received underage stamps upon entering, he said, but were found sitting with drinks in front of them.

Gobble didn't hear what happened to the two women, but said he felt Brother's wasn't liable, because "we did our job by stamping them."

No tickets or warnings were issued to the bar, he said.

Although ABC has been around in the past, Gobble said he felt they were becoming "more and more a problem," because of the raised drinking age.

Concerning his thoughts on ABC's actions, Gobble said, "They're doing their job, and they're entitled to do it."

He said the raised drinking age has resulted in an increase in drinking

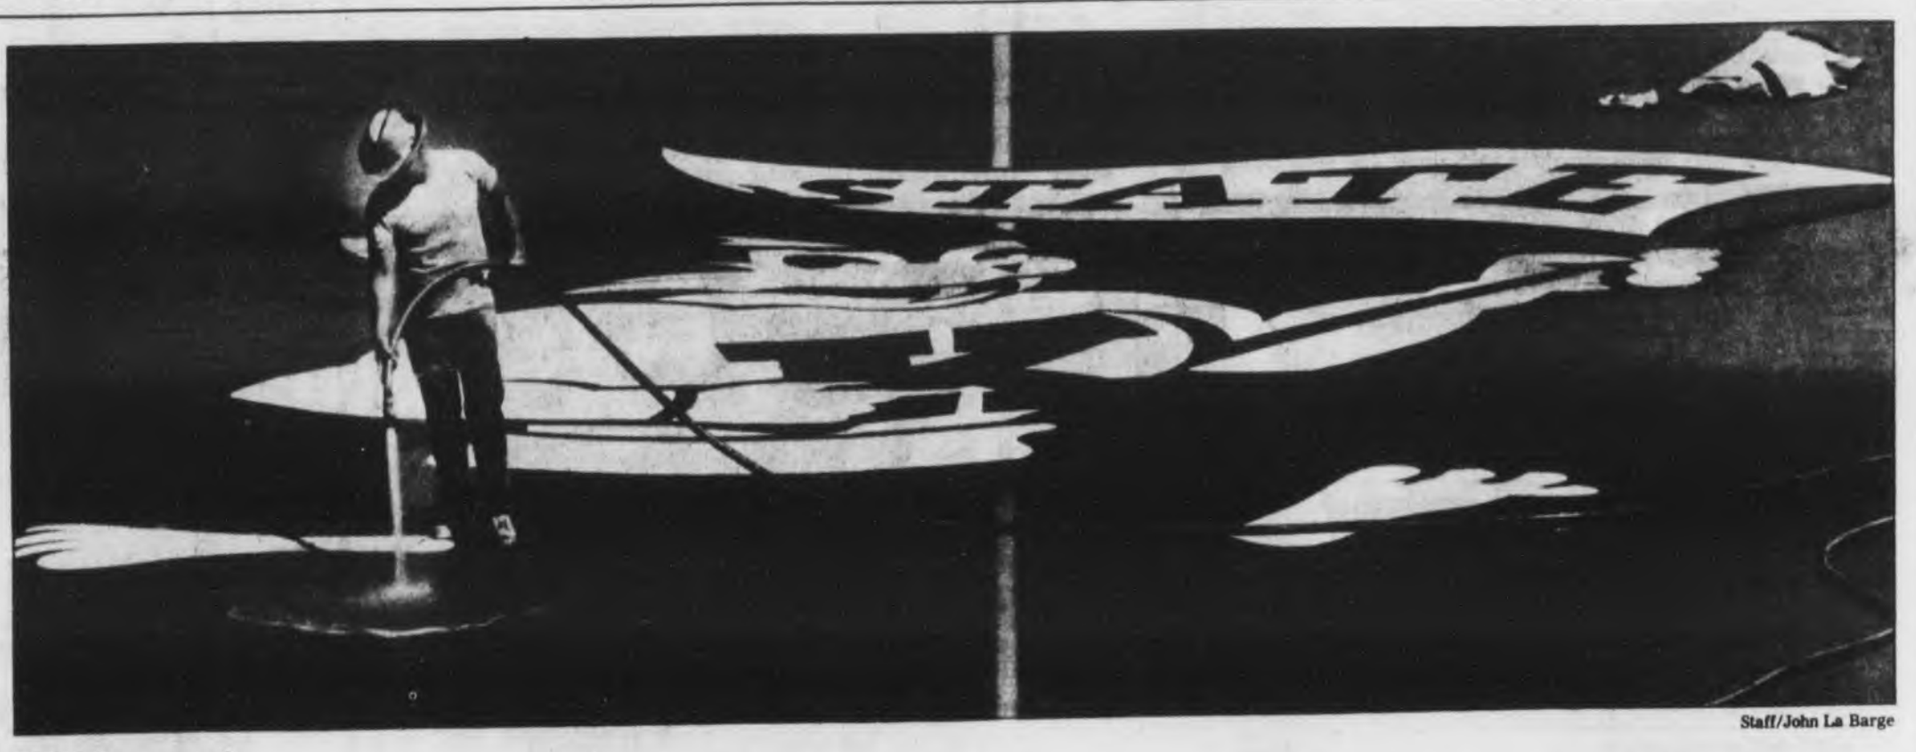
S. African police kill 12 in clash

By The Associated Press



JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Police shot 12 blacks to death and at least 69 other people were injured in overnight clashes in Soweto, the government said Wednesday. A newspaper said a mob hacked one Soweto councilor to death.

Unconfirmed reports said 20 people were killed and more than 80 injured. The violence was the worst reported since a nationwide state of emergency was declared June 12.

Residents said the clashes were linked to efforts by Soweto council police to evict tenants conducting a rent boycott.

The state Bureau for Information said eight of the deaths and most of the injuries occurred Tuesday night when police shot into a crowd from which a hand grenade had been

New director focuses plan on McCain's student crowd

By RONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

One year ago, when Stephen Riggs and his wife, Melissa, left Columbia, Mo., and moved to K-State, he was unaware anything existed "west of Missouri." But after a year in Manhattan, Riggs decided he "very much likes the community," and has even become accustomed to "no trees."

On Aug. 1, he accepted a 10-month appointment as director of McCain Auditorium.

Riggs replaces Richard Diehl, whose resignation was announced June 5 after two years as McCain's director. Diehl is now the director of audience development for the School of Fine Arts at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio.

A national search for a new McCain director will take place some time this year, according to an announcement made by William Stamey, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Riggs is looking forward to serving as McCain's new director. The duties are complex and varied.

Act could force military cuts

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon would have to discharge almost 600,000 active-duty and reserve personnel starting in October if automatic budget cuts called for by the Gramm-Rudman Act are triggered, the Defense Department said Wednesday.

Lt. Col. Pete Wyro, a Pentagon spokesman, said the department's Office of the Comptroller had completed an analysis which shows roughly 310,000 active-duty members of the services and another 280,000 reservists and National Guard personnel would have to be discharged to satisfy the spending reductions.

Those projections are markedly higher than the initial estimates provided by Pentagon and Congressional Budget Office officials last week when the latest projections for the national budget deficit for fiscal 1987 were released. At the time, officials had predicted the cuts required under the law to lower the deficit would affect some 200,000 active-duty personnel.

The spending cuts are far from a certainty. Congress still has time to make additional cuts to other parts of the federal budget, which would lower the projected deficit and thus avoid triggering the deficit-reduction law. And Congress has yet to replace a key section of the law that was struck down earlier this summer by the Supreme Court.

If the reductions were actually ordered, however, the Defense Department would lose almost 15 percent of its 2.1-million-member active-duty force and 25 percent of its 1.1-million-member force of reservists and National Guard troops.

Last week, the Congressional Budget Office and the president's Office of Management and Budget released a report estimating the fiscal 1987 deficit at roughly $163.4 billion, or $19.4 billion over target set forth in the Gramm-Rudman Act, named for Sens. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, and Warren Rudman, R-N.H.

The law specifies that half of that $19.4 billion excess, or $9.7 billion, must come from military programs, and half from civilian programs. To meet the target, the budget offices estimated that defense spending would have to be reduced by 5.6 percent and non-defense programs cut by 7.6 percent.

Of the $9.7 billion that would have to be cut from military programs, about $200 million would come from the automatic elimination of cost-of-living increases for military retirees — leaving $9.5 billion to be cut from other Pentagon programs.

And unlike this year, when the law gave the president the authority to protect military salaries, the fiscal 1987 reductions would have to be applied to all programs equally.

The spending cuts, if they came to pass, would also affect such administration priorities as the "Star Wars" anti-missile research effort along with spending on new weapons, training and military construction projects. Pentagon officials also have noted that unlike this year — when Gramm-Rudman specifically barred any closures of military bases — such closures could become a possibility in fiscal 1987.

Fort Riley official speculates on budget reduction impact

By The Collegian Staff

What effect the Gramm-Rudman budget reduction law will have on Fort Riley is nearly impossible to gauge at this early date, said Capt. John Haire, of the Public Affairs Office at Fort Riley.

"Since none of us has a 'crystal ball,' we can only wait for the Congress and the Department of Defense to make decisions, and then put out communications to the field. We will have to adopt a 'wait-and-see' attitude," Haire said.

The Associated Press reported Wednesday that cuts in both active duty and reserve strength could occur if the automatic cutting measure in the legislation are implemented. Fort Riley has not received any notification of impending cuts, Haire said.

"If it (Gramm-Rudman) really happens, virtually nothing will be known at Fort Riley for at least a week, possibly three weeks after the enactment of such provisions. If personnel cuts were to happen, it is a very slow, drawn out process. Personnel cuts is a very complex issue," Haire said.

Haire said one of the problems about a news release like this is that it is all highly speculative and a lot of people get scared. He said it is hard to imagine the wheels of government moving fast enough to affect any changes of such magnitude by Oct. 1.

"The news media is usually way ahead of official channels for getting the word out," Haire said. "We know only what we read in newspapers and see on television at this point."

Mexicans charge state policemen

MEXICO CITY — Eleven state policemen charged with mistreating a U.S. drug agent while he was in custody have been ordered to appear in court within two days.

Charges filed Tuesday accuse the Jalisco state officers of abusing their authority and injuring Drug Enforcement Administration agent Victor Cortez while he was in their custody Aug. 13. They must appear in a Guadalajara court by Friday night.

A spokesman for the Jalisco attorney general said Wednesday he could not comment on whether the policemen had been detained. He referred all questions to the federal Attorney General's Office, where secretaries said authorized spokesmen either were not in the office or not at their desks to receive telephone calls.

The newspaper Excelsior's national service reported from Guadalajara, the Jalisco state capital 360 miles northwest of Mexico City, that none of the 11 was under arrest.

In Washington, the State Department said it views the start of legal proceedings as a "positive development."

Spokesman Charles Redman said Cortez suffered "brutal torture" and the United States is "ready to assist Mexican authorities in moving expeditiously to bring to justice those responsible."

Train derailment kills 2 Kansans

STRATTON, Colo. — Two crewmen who died in the collision of a freight train and 14 runaway grain cars were identified Wednesday, as the body of the second man was removed from the wreckage.

The body of Robert J. Miller of Goodland, conductor of the Kyle Railroad freight train, was removed from the debris on Tuesday, authorities said. The body of engineer Paul Lake, also of Goodland, was found at about noon on Wednesday, authorities added.

The collision occurred near here Monday night but the wreck was not found until Tuesday morning.

Investigators said the grain cars rolled away from an elevator at Arriba and reached up to an estimated 45 miles an hour on an eastbound downgrade. The train was headed west out of Goodland.

The grain cars rolled about 31 miles before they collided with the train, investigators said.

"It's unusual to have an accident like this, where there is that much damage and fatalities," National Transportation Safety Board inspector Gordon Inglis said. "(We) have cars roll away a lot of times, but normally we have what we call a derailer that is supposed to be on."

Inglis said the locomotive in which the two men were riding was crushed.

The freight train, owned by Kyle Railroad, had two locomotives and 33 cars. The grain cars were not owned by Kyle Railroad but the company is responsible for their operation on the tracks.

Inglis said the accident happened in "dark territory" — a stretch of tracks where there are no signals to keep track of passing trains.

Body part shipment breaks no law

PHILADELPHIA — No federal laws were broken when a Philadelphia doctor shipped human heads and other body parts to a Denver research center, an FBI spokesman said Wednesday.

Investigators found 25 heads and five arms at the Colorado Otologic Research Center, The Philadelphia Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News reported, citing unidentified police sources in both cities.

United Parcel Service employees in Louisville, Ky., found five heads in a package intended for the research center, prompting the investigation last month. The package came from the office of Dr. Martin Spector, an eye, nose and throat specialist in Philadelphia.

Spector, 70, has not been charged with a crime and is helping investigators, according to his lawyer, Edward T. Feierstein.

"At this point, in Denver, we don't see any federal violation leap out at us," FBI spokesman Richard Schussler said Wednesday.

He told the Inquirer "the only violation that we are looking into is interstate transportation of stolen property" if it turns out the body parts were illegally obtained.

The Philadelphia district attorney's office is looking into state charges of defiling a corpse and possible state health law violations, Schussler said.

Schussler aid the Denver investigation was complete and that all information, including photos of the heads, was sent to authorities in Philadelphia.

Lampoon to parody national paper

MINNEAPOLIS — Short stories in little black boxes. Splashy color. No sentences longer than four words.

They're all part of a parody of USA Today being published by staff members of The Harvard Lampoon.

"We sort of saw the absurdity and caught most everything they do," Dan Greaney, editor of the parody issue, said Tuesday.

The exact contents are being kept secret until the parody's Sept. 15 release, the same day USA Today celebrates its fourth anniversary as a nationally circulated newspaper.

Editors of the mock issue are keeping mum except to say they plan to distribute 750,000 copies of an almost exact replica of the design-conscious newspaper. They will poke fun at nearly every detail of USA Today, from the weather map to its cheery optimism.

However, a newspaper in St. Cloud, Minn., published a photograph showing part of the parody issue. Some of the teasers at the top of the newspaper, include "Fonda Fat ... New Diet Won't Work," "Kittens: Cats of the Future?" and "Toxic Leak: Refrigerator Perry Hit: Leaks Deadly Freon."

Greaney, 21, came up with the idea last winter and enlisted the support of about a dozen undergraduate student members of The Harvard Lampoon, a campus humor magazine.

Joe Armstrong, publisher of the venture, said USA Today was picked because "it's the hottest newspaper in the country."

Advertising for the four-section issue cost $35,000 a page and sold out, Armstrong said. One advertiser who took the whole back page was Allen H. Neuharth, chairman of the Gannett Co. Inc., which publishes USA Today.

"Allen Neuharth bought the last page so that he could have the last word," Armstrong said. "But we let him do it because he paid extra." Neuharth paid double the advertising rate, said Armstrong.

Volcano disaster relief arrives in Cameroon

By The Associated Press

YAOUNDE, Cameroon — Food and medicine reached refugees on Wednesday who fled the gas-tainted mountains of northwest Cameroon, and scientists probed the muddy lake that spewed a killer cloud of fumes.

International relief supplies began arriving to help this tropical West African nation cope with the natural disaster that killed more than 1,500 people.

Officials said nearly all of the dead had been buried, most of them near where they were found. The biggest remaining concern, they said, was burying thousands of dead animals putrefying in the stifling heat.

The rugged terrain, unpaved roads and unreliable communications hampered relief efforts.

Army troops evacuated about 3,000 survivors of the gas explosion, but had trouble sealing off the area from people who wanted to return to their homes. About 2,000 soliders have closed off the area, which is about 200 miles northwest of Yaounde.

"Our first priority is to set our priorities," said Jean-Marcel Mengueme, chairman of the government's crisis committee.

Scientists believe that a volcanic tremor under Lake Nios released a bubble of deadly gas that rose to the surface and spread over the area last Thursday night.

Until now, rescue operations, burial details and the transport of relief supplies were the responsibility of the Cameroonian army.

One Western diplomat said the army, which has three U.S.-built Hercules transport planes and a few smaller aircraft, was having difficulty dealing with the influx of supplies.

"It's a problem," said the diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity. "This government never faced anything on this scale before."

Most of the refugees moved in with relatives outside the stricken district. A few hundred homeless people were evacuated to the town of Wum, about 20 miles from the disaster area, said Ivo Yenwo, an aide to President Paul Biya.

Scientists began analyzing the water of Lake Nios, which the eruption turned from a brilliant blue to a murky reddish brown.

"I sent a team yesterday to take samples of the water," said Bienvenu Fouda, secretary-general of the Ministry of Mines. "They will report and make proposals."

Yenwo said residents of the disaster area had been warned not to drink local water. He said the army had provided tanks of purified water and that bottled water was an urgent need.

A 17-member Israeli medical team that arrived in Cameroon on Monday reached the hospital in Nkambe, 60 miles east of Wum.

A six-member French scientific team flew to the provincial capital of Bamenda on Tuesday but was unable to reach the disaster area 70 miles away.

The government asked the United States to send technical experts, tents, acid-proof suits, gas detectors and food supplies, according to the State Department. Deputy spokesman Charles Redman said Washington has initially invested about $250,000 and expects that figure to rise.

Redman said a team of U.S. doctors and another of scientists were en route to Cameroon to determine the cause of the incident.

Officials said Italy and the European Common Market were also sending aid. It still was not known exactly what gas killed nearly all life around the small lake.

Leaders voice concern on tax reform

By The Associated Press

Business executives and political leaders across America are bracing for a dramatic fallout on state and local economies from the radical overhaul of the federal tax system.

They say the new tax law awaiting final approval by Congress will provide relief to some industries while forcing others to live without the tax shelters and breaks long built into their balance sheets.

A 50-state survey by The Associated Press found much anxiety and uncertainty, mixed with occasional jubilation, about the impact of the tax changes.

Textile manufacturers fear hard times ahead. The real estate industry is practically in mourning. But even there, some see new opportunities. The Memphis-based Holiday Inn hotel chain hopes for a respite from the pell-mell growth of hotel construction in recent years, which could drive up the industry's sagging occupancy rates.

Kent Oyler, treasurer of the Henry Vogt Machinery Co. in Louisville, said his company may invite fewer customers to the Kentucky Derby because the new law will allow it to deduct only 80 percent of the cost of business meals.

New York City officials think restrictions on issuing bonds for quasi-government projects could torpedo some apartment house projects, and force the city to assume ownership of incinerator projects.

The compromise bill, crafted by a House-Senate conference committee, would sweep dozens of tax breaks out of the code, cut back real estate tax shelters and reduce rates while shifting more taxes from the shoulders of individuals to businesses.

"The real estate industry is absolutely nailed," said Jay Shuster, a tax specialist for Rock-Tenn Co. in Norcross, Ga.

Paul Snyder, a developer instrumental in building a Hyatt Regency Hotel in downtown Buffalo, N.Y., said, "We, like everyone else, are going to be cautious about starting new projects."

But in Memphis, Kris Stewart, a spokeswoman for Holiday Corp., the parent of the Holiday Inn chain, said, "Investment in hotel building will go back more to a real estate than a tax-break basis. People will not be going into the hotel business simply to get a tax break."

Large banks with more than $500 million in assets would lose their deduction for maintaining bad-debt reserves.

That "will cost us plenty in taxes," said Robert S. McCoy Jr., president of SCN Corp., parent of South Carolina National Bank.

Ashby Ward, executive vice president of the Myrtle Beach (S.C.) Area Chamber of Commerce, said a construction slowdown could help his county, one of the nation's fastest growing. "Our growth of facilities has outpaced growth in tourism," he said. "We need a slowdown until demand gets closer to availability."

Most analysts say the tax revision will come down hard on smokestack industries that have relied heavily on investment tax credits and rapid depreciation, while lightening the load on service industries, which had a relatively high tax burden. The maximum corporate tax will drop from 46 percent to 34 percent.

Burning the midnight oil may be necessary.
Burning the 2:00 or 3:00 or 4:00 AM oil is absurd.
Especially when an HP calculator can get the answers you want — in time to get a good night's sleep.
For instance, our HP-15C Professional Scientific Calculator has more built-in advanced math and statistical power than any other calculator. Our HP-41 Advanced Scientific Calculators have even more potential.

That's because there are better than 2500 software packages available for them — more than for any other calculator.
There's even a special plug-in software package (we call it the Advantage Module) that's designed to handle the specific problems an engineering student has to solve in his, or her, course work.
No wonder professionals in engineering and the physical sciences widely regard HP calculators as the best you can get.
So check one out. Then, when your mother calls to ask if you're getting enough sleep, you won't have to lie.

Editorial

Required classes need fixed revenue source

Recruiters tell prospective students of the glorious rewards of a degree from K-State, yet they fail to mention how precarious it may be to obtain this degree because of something called contingent funding.

All students must complete two composition classes to be eligible for graduation, yet because of a lack of contingent funds, 20 composition classes offered this semester were almost canceled.

Because Dean William Stamey of the College of Arts and Sciences was able to come up with $25,000 at the last moment, only six classes were canceled and all students involved were absorbed in the remaining classes.

However, the danger remains because the Department of English is still short $50,000. If another $25,000 is not located by next semester, 20 composition classes will have to be canceled, leaving many students without a chance of taking these required classes during the spring semester.

Retention is a known problem. Yet how can students be pleased with their choice of K-State if they are forced to shuffle around and join overcrowded classes on the first day because of cancellations?

As Henry Donaghy, chairman of the English department explained, the contingent funds used for these classes are the leftovers from other departments.

Due to a $86,816 budget cut within the College of Arts and Sciences, contingent funds, or leftovers, were quite scarce.

K-State is funding required classes with leftover funds. A synonym for contingent is "possible." K-State could end up with contingent graduating classes if it continues handling funds in this manner. K-State itself may end up a contingent University if something is not done by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Set budgets should be maintained for required classes. How can a university operate when required classes are not considered priority?

Donaghy put it best when he said, "I can understand receiving some contingent funding, but not for the whole darn program...it's a colossal irony when you recruit students to come to K-State, and they get here and required classes cannot be had."

Students should take parents to first game

There has been a lot of criticism about this year's first football game, scheduled during Labor Day weekend.

Labor Day weekend is traditionally the time when students go home to get things they forgot or didn't have room to bring on their first trip to school.

Wildcat football coach Stan Parrish said the game is being played Aug. 30 because of a scheduling problem. But he sees the early date as a benefit. He said he wanted to play the first game in the state, and because of a shorter amount of practice time, the team has worked harder to prepare.

Parrish said students are the life of the crowd and the team needs their support. He's counting on students to cheer for the team.

Maybe this year, parents and friends could come to Manhattan for Labor Day weekend. They could see where students live and go to Aggieville without being stampeded by thousands of visitors and students visiting on other home-game weekends.

That way, students can cheer for the Wildcats' first game of the year and show parents and friends the town. Maybe they'll even bring along baggage left at home.

Student fees may go to wrong department

For the sake of fairness and service to students, an athletic fee should be regarded as ill-fated and not in the interest of those who must pay it.

The fee would require all students to pay a fee at enrollment. In return they would receive price-reduced tickets to athletic events.

The purpose of such a fee is to maintain athletic teams that can't attract enough ticketed spectators to keep NCAA Division IA rating. University officials hope enrollment will increase because students will be interested in the athletic program.

Another intention is to bring more media attention to the University and attract students for enrollment.

For students, unfortunately, an athletic fee would be unfair. While everyone will be taxed with this fee, not all will be able to use it either because they aren't interested in the games, or they are unable to get a ticket because of a sell out. Students don't want to subsidize someone else to sit in a seat for which they paid.

The money assessed through such a fee would more likely yield the same enrollment results if used in other areas. For example, if that money was put in the Department of Physics to update it with a complete line of modern equipment, the department would be considered among the best programs in the nation. This would result in a large influx of physics students.

An athletic fee, on the other hand, represents at best a gamble because it can't guarantee winning teams, let alone attract of more students.

Whatever the Athletic Fee Task Force and Student Senate decide, the interests of the students who pay this fee should be kept a priority. Perhaps the best way to handle this situation would be to leave this money in the pockets of the students.

'Star Wars' hurts chance for peace

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

Last week Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the Soviet Communist Party, announced the Soviet Union would continue its moratorium on nuclear testing until Jan. 1, 1987.

President Reagan, however, has made it clear the United States will not follow suit "as long as a nuclear deterrent is as essential to our security as it is today."

Although this may seem like just one more defeat for disarmament, a nuclear freeze or detente in general, it is actually a result of Reagan's consistently inflexible stance on the Strategic Defense Initiative, or "Star Wars," a proposed defense system that has already shattered various arms reduction plans in its short and dubious history.

For example, last winter Reagan flatly refused to discuss the possibility of limiting SDI research or deployment. With that refusal went the possibility of implementing or even discussing Gorbachev's plan to "eliminate nuclear weapons by the year 2000." Gorbachev even provided a reduction timetable which indicated the Soviets were ready to start immediately.

For months it looked as if any chances for meaningful discussion would remain just that — chances. But in a surprising reversal this summer Gorbachev agreed to allow Star Wars research to continue, as long as deployment does not occur for seven years. However, despite the years of research needed for such an immense and questionable project as SDI, Reagan would agree to only 3½ years before initial deployment.

But what does Reagan's nuclear test-ban refusal have to do with SDI, a system to be based on laser technology? The X-ray laser, which in theory will shoot down Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles, is to be powered by — you guessed it — a nuclear explosion.

If this sounds a little bizarre to some readers, they should realize they are not alone. In a letter to the editor of Commentary, the Union of Concerned Scientists explained that for SDI to work, it would have to be able to destroy airborne missiles in their "boost phases" — while they were still ascending. Because of the round shape of the earth, such an attack against Soviet missiles would have to be launched from space.

Yet, the group also concluded that "orbiting defenses suffer from one fatal flaw: they would rely on delicate precision instruments which would be exquisitely vulnerable to attack." George Reiter, professor of physics at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, offered a similar opinion at a Lou Douglas Lecture last year.

In fact, one notable scientist concluded, "Lasers won't fill the bill — they must be deployed in great numbers at terrible cost and could be destroyed in advance of an attack." That comment was made by Edward Teller, himself an advocate of SDI.

Assuming then, that SDI would somehow work — something that apparently even its proponents are reluctant to say — it would still not protect the United States in the event of a Soviet nuclear attack. SDI is designed to zap ICBMs as they travel through space. It is not designed to deal with intercontinental bombers or submarine launched ballistic missiles, SLBMs — both of which would fly under the protective net of armed satellites that SDI is to provide.

The real question central to this issue, however, is not how feasible SDI is — the Reagan administration has already proved that even doubts about SDI's feasibility from such members of the Union of Concerned Scientists as Hans A. Bethe, Richard L. Garwin and Carl Sagan cannot alter his adamant stance. The real question we should ask is, how much Reagan is willing to sacrifice for SDI?

John Pike of the Federation of American Scientists has estimated that SDI research alone could reach $90 billion by 1994, while James Schlesinger, former Secretary of Defense, said production and deployment might reach $1 trillion. I think the size of that number warrants a pause to look at its numerical representation: $1,000,000,000,000.

After we catch our breath, we should remember it's only money — another sacrifice has been our credibility as a nation by offering so little resistance to Reagan's plans and their repercussions for a safer world.

But the real sacrifices, of course, have been in the "chances for arms reduction" category. First, there is no evidence to suggest that SDI deployment will somehow lead to a reduction of nuclear weapons. In fact, the Hoffman Panel, a group appointed at the president's request to study the strategic implications of SDI, reported that any deployment of a defense system would be met by an increased production of Soviet offensive weapons to counter it.

Furthermore, because of Reagan's unwillingness to let Gorbachev put his missiles where his mouth is, we may never know how serious Gorbachev is about arms reductions.

True, some of Gorbachev's proposals have been unrealistic — for instance, holding the United States responsible for the dismantling of British and French missiles — but the proposals coming from the Kremlin do seem to be of a different nature than past propaganda ploys, especially in light of Gorbachev's apparent willingness to allow on-site inspection of suspected test sites. In short, if Gorbachev is a fraud, then why not show the world what a fraud he is?

But if all of these Soviet proposals are simply SDI-delay tactics, then perhaps the Soviets are doing us, as well as themselves, a favor. Perhaps a delay would give us time to consider the consequences of the president's actions. We may never get a chance to find out.

Student president announces plans

STEVEN JOHNSON
Guest Columnist

The semester is once again underway, as is evidenced by a marked increase in difficulty crossing streets such as Denison Avenue and Manhattan Avenue. The joys of waiting in line to drop/add classes and repeating name, address and social security number numerous times also mark our long-anticipated return.

It is great to have everyone back. Manhattan and certainly the University just aren't the same when so many of the students are gone.

K-State has continued in operation over the summer giving the faculty and administration a chance to catch up and prepare for this fall. University President Jon Wefald has added a new dimension to the University, bringing a unique enthusiasm to his office. He also added a new dimension to the structure of the administration by creating a vice president for institutional advancement to aid recruitment.

With the same goal in mind he hired nine recent K-State graduates as admissions counselors to travel to high schools in Kansas. He is also restructuring the Educational and Student Services branch, which student government is watching with great interest.

Student government continued to work this summer also. We assisted with the selection of the new University positions, and continued working with and for student concerns.

I did work with our orientation program and visited the University of Kansas and Wichita State University to learn about their programs. I will look into the possibility of developing new ideas to improve our program and, in turn, retention.

Fred Bramlage Coliseum has progressed and plans were delivered to the State Division of Architectural Services Aug. 1. Bids should be opened about Sept. 23. We hope approval will occur at the October Board of Regents meeting. Construction is scheduled to start immediately and be completed in two years. Although this has been a controversial issue to say the least, I am convinced it will be a positive move overall and will be an exciting project for us to follow in anticipation of its completion.

I will be organizing the college council presidents into an advisory group to help keep me informed of student opinion and desires. We hope to brainstorm solutions or at least improvements to some problems. One subject I am planning to discuss is the role of each college's student ambassadors. We will also work to strengthen the college councils and develop a list of student priorities.

My cabinet and I will be working on various issues. We are looking into the age-old parking issue to see what studies have been done and on which ideas we could feasibly initiate action. We will attempt to respond to issues brought out in the Collegian and welcome any concerns students might bring to us.

We also will continue efforts to meet students personally. If you have a group you would like me to visit with call the Student Governing Services office and let me know. I will be contacting many groups, but undoubtedly will not catch you all.

Finally, our new coaches will provide excitement in the University's athletic programs. In a few months we will be able to observe the progress of the basketball team under Lon Kruger, and in a very short time we'll be able to see the results of Stan Parrish's efforts.

Our coaches and our teams need our support. A strong backing from the student body really can make a difference. I strongly encourage you to be enthusiastic about our programs. If everyone shows this enthusiasm about all aspects of K-State, we then will have a great year and a better University.

Thank you for your interest and best wishes for a great semester.

Steven Johnson is a junior in agriculture economics and student body president.

Konza Area to have first tour since 1984

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

For students and area residents wondering what the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area is about, a visitor's day has been scheduled for 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Sept. 27.

The area, comprised of about 8,600 acres, is used as an outdoor laboratory managed by the University for ecological research. Access to the facility, located southeast of Manhattan on McDowell Creek Road, is restricted at times other than visitor's day. The last visitor's day was in 1984 when about 1,200 persons toured the facility, according to John Zimmerman, research scientist at the prairie.

The Nature Conservancy, a private conservation group, put the land area together from 1971-1977, and leased the land to the University.

Zimmerman said "all parts of the ecosystem are studied" at the facility, including the nutrition cycle involving both plants and animals.

The prairie is also used to study the impact of fire on an ecosystem, including its effects on nitrogen fixation.

"We study everything from dirt and rocks to plants and animals," Zimmerman said.

He said the visitor's day would give people an opportunity to not only see the site, but to also gain an appreciation for the work done at the facility.

The day's events will include an "almost continuous slide show" and hikes of various lengths, ranging between a half mile and four miles. Researchers working at the facility will serve as tour guides and will be available to answer questions from visitors.

Zimmerman said hay wagon rides will be available for those not wishing to hike. The Riley County Historical Society will also conduct tours of the historic Dewey Ranch buildings now used by the research facility.

Also planned are displays on prairie streams, plants and animals of the prairie and poster displays of current ecological research.

"The Konza Prairie has been set aside in perpetuity for the purpose of long-term ecological research," and is one of only 11 sites funded by the National Science Foundation in its Long-Term Ecological Research Program, Zimmerman said.

The prairie can be reached by going over the Third Street viaduct, turning south on McDowell Creek Road (Riley County 901), traveling about six miles and turning at the Konza Prairie sign. The headquarters is located about one mile past the sign.

On Interstate 70, motorists should turn at Exit 307 and travel north about five miles, turning when they reach the Konza Prairie sign.

Rehnquist may face another FBI probe

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Declaring that William H. Rehnquist's "ethical conduct" is in question, four senators want a new FBI probe of allegations that the chief justice-designate concealed a trust fund from his disabled brother-in-law.

Democrats Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, Alan Cranston of California, Paul Simon of Illinois and Howard M. Metzenbaum of Ohio made the request Tuesday in a letter to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond.

The brother-in-law, Harold Dickerson Cornell of San Diego, has made the allegations against Rehnquist, who is seeking Senate approval to become chief justice of the Supreme Court. A victim of multiple sclerosis, Cornell told reporters he lived in poverty for two decades, never knowing that the trust existed to help him financially during his illness.

Cornell said Rehnquist, who drew up the trust while a Phoenix attorney in 1961, concealed the trust for 21 years. During that period, the $25,000 fund grew by $10,000, he said.

The trust was established by Dr. Harold Davis Cornell, father of Harold Dickerson Cornell and Rehnquist's wife, Natalie.

The four senators asked that the FBI complete its investigation in one week.

They wrote Thurmond, "We understand that the FBI conducted a limited investigation of this issue, but that a number of fundamental questions remain unanswered. A number of legal scholars have stated that an attorney is obligated to disclose the existence of a trust" in such a case.

"Consequently, if these allegations are true, they raise serious questions about Justice Rehnquist's ethical conduct as the attorney who drew up this trust."

Toni House, spokeswoman for the Supreme Court, said Rehnquist would have no comment.

Thurmond's spokesman, Mark Goodin, said, "Senator Thurmond's position is that it's a matter already investigated thoroughly by the FBI. As far as Senator Thurmond is concerned, the report found no merit in those charges. Therefore in his opinion the matter is closed."

Non-registered males qualify to receive aid

By The Collegian Staff

Although several states deny state financial aid to male students who fail to register with Selective Service, Kansas is not among them, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance.

Nine states have enacted legislation, and several others have proposed such legislation, said Lewis C. Brodsky, assistant director of public affairs for the Selective Service System in Washington, D.C.

Men age 18 or older who have not registered with Selective Service can be denied federal financial aid at the University, said.

Males who are of age must sign a statement indicating they are registered before receiving federal financial assistance, he said.

"This law has been in effect here for at least three years," Viterna said. "These are federal regulations to which every state must comply."

Although K-State denies federal financial aid to such students, it will not deny entrance to the University, said Richard Elkins, director of undergraduate admissions.

Elkins said he didn't see why a state institution should be involved in carrying out a federal law by denying entrance to non-registered students.

"I don't think it (denying entrance) should be an issue," he said. "And, although I was drafted myself many years ago, I would not be in favor of it."

Although he wasn't previously aware of the law denying federal aid to non-registered males, Ty Ritter, senior in finance, said he saw nothing wrong with the idea.

"I think if the federal government is going to give money to a student, the student ought to be registered, because it is that government he would be defending," he said.

Paul Hardenburger, junior in construction science, said although the law may have never gained approval in the 1960s or '70s, he said he felt denying financial aid was a good way do enforce registration.

Brodsky said non-registration with the Selective Service is a felony with maximum penalties of $250,000 in fines and five years in prison.

Wefald to lead Junction City parade

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

University President Jon Wefald and the University's marching band will participate in Junction City's third annual Family Fun Festival Parade at 11 a.m. Saturday.

The parade theme, celebrating Kansas' birthday, will be "125 years of Kansas," and Wefald will be the parade's grand marshal. The parade will include bands, floats, antique cars and Shrine units.

Parade Chairman Gary Barrick said he had received 47 commitments for high schools and groups who had been invited to participate. The parade will begin at Junction City High School, Ninth and Eisenhower streets, then will head east on Sixth to Washington streets, then north on Washington Street to Ninth Street, Barrick said.

"We want to get everyone involved in some good, clean fun," said Burt Lusenhop, chairman of the Family Fun Festival committee.

"We're expecting good weather and good times for our festivities this year," said Norm Childs, Director of the Geary County Convention and Visitors' Bureau. "We had some bad luck with terrible weather the last two years, but we're optimistic because we moved the event up three weeks earlier. We expect a grand showing, especially from our neighbors northeast of us in Manhattan."

After the parade, bathtub races begin at 1 p.m., followed by an adult tricycle race, a water/spoon race and a three-legged race.

On Labor Day, the festival winds down with events from 1 to 6 p.m. in Eagle's Hall, including a talent show from 2 to 5 p.m. Climax of the three-day festival will be an awards presentation and closing ceremony. A drawing for a 1986 Chevrolet Chevette will serve as the finale. A $2 donation will buy one ticket and a $5 donation will buy three chances on the car.

Ward Haylett's athletes knew who was boss

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Ward Haylett would be classified by today's standards as a no-nonsense coach — a strict disciplinarian.

"They (the athletes) knew I was the boss," he said.

Haylett, 90, who coached track at K-State from 1928 until his retirement in 1963, will be recognized for his services during halftime of the season-opening football game with Western Illinois. He also served as head football coach from 1942-1944, and as an assistant prior to that.

Haylett made it clear to his athletes he would not tolerate unacceptable behavior from his athletes and insisted that his athletes put academics before sports. He said he considers the de-emphasis of academics to be a great tragedy.

"If any of them (college athletes) are allowed to compete without getting a real college education, that's what I hate to see," he said.

Haylett said he would not tolerate the use of alcohol or drugs, an infraction often dealt with lightly these days.

"I'd kick 'em off," he said.

Haylett has no sympathy for those athletes who complain that they are exploited by the universities' athletic departments.

"They are fortunate to be able to have the chance to compete," Haylett said.

"I'd tell him if he doesn't like it to leave," he added.

He remembers well how K-State was always the smallest school in the conference.

"We didn't have much money to go on," Haylett said.

With few scholarships available, almost all of Haylett's athletes came from within the state — many from small towns in western Kansas. A few, such as sprinter Thane Baker from Elkhart, went on to become Olympic or national champions.

When choosing which athletes would be on his teams, Haylett said, the most important quality he sought in each was desire. "A desire to be on the team, to compete for Kansas State (was very important)," Haylett said.

Among Haylett's impressive list of accomplishments is his induction into the National Track and Field Hall of Fame in 1979. Haylett was also the head coach of the United States' track team in the 1937 Pan Am Games, an assistant coach at the 1948 Olympics in London, and three-time member of the United States Olympic Track and Field Committee.

Haylett, born in Willow Springs, Mo., in 1895, said he developed a love for sports at an early age and began competing in grade school. He participated in track, baseball, basketball and football in high school and college.

He graduated from Doane College in Crete, Neb., and began a high school coaching career. Later he was hired by his alma mater, and after five years at Doane, he came to K-State.

Track, Haylett said, has always been his first love in sports, since it has something to offer for all types of athletes.

"The big, slow boy can be the shot putter. The fast one can be the dash man, and, of course, the man with endurance can run distances. So there's something for every type of individual," Haylett said.

Haylett himself was quite versatile in his competitive days.

When asked what events he did compete in, he answered with a chuckle, "Well, I didn't run the two mile — that's about all."

To prove that not everything has changed in 40 years, Haylett's eyes lit up as he recounted how his team beat a heavily favored Nebraska team in Lincoln his first year as football coach.

"I think the biggest thrill I ever got was beating Nebraska in Lincoln, especially when I went to high school and coached a small college in the state," he said.

Among the honors bestowed upon him, Haylett lists being selected to coach some track and field events during the 1948 Olympics as one of the highlights.

"Naturally, it was a big thrill," he said, "especially being out here with a relatively unknown team."

Several of the athletes he coached there won medals, including 17-year-old Bob Matthias who captured the imagination of the entire world by winning the decathlon.

"He was a great boy," Haylett said, "and he still is. He comes through and sees me every once in a while."

Haylett takes an intense pride in "his" athletes, and he speaks highly of them. He said he has stayed in touch with many of them through the years.

"They were all individualists, but at the same time they were great for the school and great for the team," he said.

Haylett has few regrets and many fond memories from his illustrious career.

Former K-State track and football coach Ward Haylett smiles with pride when asked his most memorable moment as a coach. "Beating Nebraska in football at Lincoln," he says. Haylett will be honored Saturday at the Western Illinois-K-State football game.

Travis now considered top choice for AD job

By The Collegian Staff

The Jacksonville (Fla.) Times-Union reported Wednesday that K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis is now the leading candidate for the unfilled Florida University athletic director position.

Travis interviewed with the Florida search committee Tuesday and Wednesday on the Gainseville campus.

The Times-Union also reported that Louisiana State football coach Bill Arnsbarger, who was previously thought to be the leading candidate for the job being vacated by the retirement of Bill Carr, had removed his name from consideration.

Travis is now being considered the leading candidate for the job because he is an alumnus of Florida, played for the Gator football team and later coached at Florida.

The Times-Union article also stated that Georgia Southern Athletic Director David Wagner will be interviewed Sept. 5-6 by the committee. Other athletic directors being considered for the position include Cedric Warren Dempsey of the University of Arizona, Fred Gruninger of Rutgers University, and Richard Young of Washington State University.

thrown. The grenade injured four police officers, three of them black and one white.

The bureau said the crowd of about 300 people had gathered at about 10 p.m. Tuesday at a flaming barricade outside a liquor store in the black township.

The other four deaths and one injury, occurred early Wednesday when police fired at a group of about 80 people at another barricade, the bureau said.

"The council police are shooting left and right. They are shooting at everyone, everything," the Sowetan newspaper quoted an unidentified resident as saying.

The Sowetan said a mob hacked Soweto city councilor Sydenham Mkhwanazi to death, and that the house of another councilor, Sigfriend Manthata, was burned down.

A third councilor, Silas Tshabalala, was shot in the leg when his own guard apparently fired in panic, the newspaper said.

The state Bureau for Information said it could not confirm the Sowetan's reports. Asked whether unrest was continuing Wednesday in Soweto, the bureau said: "The situation there is not abnormal."

Sources at Soweto's Baragwanath Hospital told the South African Press Association that more than 80 people, most of them in their teens and early 20s, were treated for injuries.

The shootings by police took place in one of Soweto's poorest neighborhoods, White City. Soweto, outside Johannesburg, is home to about 1.5 million blacks.

Black reporters who were in contact with Soweto by telephone said violence was continuing at midmorning and spreading to other parts of Soweto. They said schools were closed.

Haylett

"Naturally, I enjoyed it or I wouldn't have stayed at it so long," he said. "I loved it and I wanted the boys who wanted to to have the best chance they possibly could."

Haylett said his greatest enjoyment from coaching came from seeing his athletes blossom both as athletes and as people during their years at K-State.

Haylett said he hoped to have left an imprint on each of his athletes even after they left him.

"I wanted them to be real men."

He defined a man as "one who has the ability to control himself and to make everything that he does a step toward a better life for himself and those who are around him."

Haylett and his wife of 66 years, Alice, still reside in Manhattan.

He said the people of K-State have always been special to him, as was evident by their enthusiastic backing of the athletic programs while he was a coach.

"We really had good support," he said. "Spirit has never been much of a problem at Kansas State."

And what advice would he impart to those who are a bit disgruntled with K-State athletics today?

"If you don't like it, get out."

and driving by minors.

"There are more kids in cars drinking now because they can't come in here," he said.

Lamb said although there is "some indication of more underagers drinking and driving," there have been no conclusive studies done to prove such a statement.

Gobble said stricter enforcement of drinking laws would not affect his business.

"It will keep the minors in line," he said, "but the others are going to come in anyway."

As for the University's views on the issue, Sutton said all students should try to cooperate.

"If they send people all over the state and don't find violators, they'll cut back," he said. "The bottom line for students is to obey the law, and there won't be any trouble."

Feds disclose '57 bombing accident

By The Associated Press

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — A 42,000-pound hydrogen bomb accidentally fell from an Air Force plane 29 years ago, it was disclosed Wednesday, but officials said there never was any chance of a nuclear explosion.

No one was injured when the bomb hit an uninhabited area 4½ miles south of Kirtland Air Force Base's control tower on May 22, 1957, the Albuquerque Journal reported in a copyright story.

The bomb created a crater about 12 feet deep and 25 feet in diameter, and minor radioactive contamination was detected there, government documents obtained by the Journal said.

Non-nuclear explosives in the Mark 17 bomb detonated when it hit the ground, the documents said. But non-nuclear explosives must be triggered in a precise manner to cause a nuclear explosion, said Rich Garcia, spokesman for the Air Force Weapons Laboratory in Albuquerque.

"When a bomb accidentally falls, the impact of the fall triggers some (non-nuclear) explosives to go off, but not in the correct fashion," he said Wednesday.

Dave Jackson, spokesman for the U.S. Department of Energy in Albuquerque, said there was another reason that it was physically impossible for the Mark 17 to produce a nuclear explosion in an accidental fall.

The bomb "had a portion of the actual weapon removed and put in a different location," he said. "It was routine procedure at the time."

The Mark 17 fell 1,700 feet from an Air Force B-36 bomber as it was flying to Kirtland Air Force Base from Biggs Army Air Field in Texas, the documents said. Kirtland is located just south of Albuquerque.

The government first reported the accident in 1981 in a brief release saying only that a nuclear weapon of some kind had been dropped. The documents obtained by the Journal through the Freedom of Information Act contain the first public description of the type of weapon involved and other details of the accident.

An exact reason why the bomb fell from the airplane, taking the bomb bay doors with it, was not given. But the government documents indicate a safety release mechanism apparently had been moved to the wrong position.

The government documents did not show the exact explosive yield of the bomb. But Stan Norris, a research associate with the Natural Resources Defense Council and a specialist on nuclear weapons, said said most researchers believe it was more than 10 megatons.

"It is possibly the most powerful bomb we ever made," Norris told the Journal.

Norris said the largest nuclear weapon in the U.S. arsenal today has a yield of about 9 megatons. A megaton measures the explosive yield of a nuclear weapon. It is the equivalent of 1 million tons, or 1,000 kilotons, of TNT.

Capt. Jim Berg, Air Force public affairs officer in Washington, D.C., said nuclear weapons are no longer carried by planes on airborne alert.

"It used to be in the old days that B-52s, or in this case a B-36, would be loaded and would fly around waiting for their need," he said.

In addition, he said in a telephone interview, modern mechanisms to attach weapons to planes are "a lot more sophisticated than they were, and the weapons are a lot more sophisticated."

Violators ignore work agreement

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A survey by the Legislature's watchdog agency reveals that authorities last year had trouble getting about one-quarter of offenders who were placed on diversion agreements in large Kansas cities to follow through with the programs.

The finding was contained in a report the Legislative Division of Post Audit presented Wednesday to an interim study panel, the Special Committee on the Judiciary.

Under diversion agreements, people charged with crimes avoid prosecution by agreeing to complete specified activities, possibly including the payment of fees, attendance at therapy sessions and the performance of community service work.

If a defendant fails to complete the assignments, prosecutors have the option of resuming criminal proceedings in the case. Diversion agreements may be drawn up either by judges or prosecutors and can apply to juveniles as well as adults.

A review of 236 diversion agreements in the state's five most populous counties showed offenders voluntarily completed the programs in slightly more than half the cases, the report said.

"In one-fourth of the cases, the requirements were not fulfilled, or were not fulfilled until the local prosecutor took some action against the offender," according to the report.

Auditors could not determine the outcome in about another quarter of the cases, the report said.

"This lack of documentation could allow local officials to unintentionally dismiss charges against offenders who have not satisfied all their diversion conditions," according to the report.

The report also said a survey of most cities and counties in the state showed local courts and prosecutors arranged a total of 11,000 diversion agreements during 1985, more than half of which involved charges of driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs.

Diversion programs also were established in some areas for people charged with a wide range of offenses, including theft, burglary, welfare and unemployment fraud.

Movie romanticizes youth of '50s

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

In his newest film, "Stand by Me," director Rob Reiner recreates the intoxicating atmosphere of a small American town, circa late '50s, cramming every frame of the film with nostalgic images of a simpler, more romantic past.

Film Review

It's a time when all trees are a beautiful, lush green and the local train is like a huge, smoke-spewing dragon. It's a time when every youngster religiously watches "The Mickey Mouse Club" and every backyard has a treehouse.

Strangely enough, "Stand by Me" is based upon a novella by master-of-horror Stephen King. And the story seems to be largely autobiographical. This means the story contains no real horror or terror, but just the same it's about fear. And as we might expect from King, the story ends up saying that real fears and the fears in our imaginations are of equal importance.

The story is about the time four 12-year-old boys hear about a corpse in the woods and decide to investigate. They tell their parents they're going to camp out, and then they sneak off on a two-day adventure, walking the railroad tracks for more than 20 miles.

One of these boys, Gordie, is the movie's central character. It seems his brother was killed in an accident and now his parents mope about the house, hardly talking at all. This confuses Gordie and makes him feel somehow responsible for what has happened. For him, seeing the corpse in the woods will be a way of coming to terms with his own brother's death.

For the other boys who absolutely love gross-out humor, a real human corpse is the most fascinating thing imaginable.

The potential is here for an intriguing story about growing up in the '50s, but sadly that potential never materializes. The movie looks good, yes, but it's never really convincing. The problem is the youngsters themselves: They are all too self-aware and intelligent for their own good. They spout lines like, "I'm in the prime of my life." This isn't how 12-year-olds behave, but it is the way adults tend to romanticize their youth, especially after a quarter century has elapsed.

This makes the film artificial, an imitation of youth as filtered through a 40-year-old mentality.

At times the movie does hit its mark, as when the boys talk about the size of Mouseketeer Annette Funicello's bust (they're sure the A and E are starting to curve back) or when they argue whether or not Goofy is a dog. (They know Pluto is a dog, but what is Goofy?) In these moments the movie seems authentic, but these moments come seldomly.

Ultimately, "Stand by Me" is one of those movies we sometimes want to like more than it deserves to be liked (possibly due to the first-rate collection of rock 'n' roll oldies used as background music, including the Ben E. King classic "Stand by Me"). Many of the ingredients are present for a first-rate adventure story, but the unconvincing set of characters sabotages everything. Each character is given a rather pat problem that influences his behavior. This kind of psychology robs the movie of the resonance it really needs.

Most disappointing is the movie's ending, which seems to say that a boy begins to mature when he's able to hold a gun on his enemy and look as if he might actually pull the trigger.

Jury indicts Nancy Reagan's maid for conspiracy to export weapons

By The Associated Press

NORFOLK, Va. — A federal grand jury Wednesday indicted Nancy Reagan's personal maid and three men on charges they conspired to illegally export ammunition without a license from Richmond to Paraguay.

Anita Sanabria Castelo, 45, of Takoma Park, Md., was charged with conspiracy to export ammunition without a license and exporting ammunition without a license.

Also named in the seven-count indictment were Julio Cesar Baez Acosta and Hernan Perdomo Duarte, Paraguayan residents who worked aboard a Paraguyan freighter, and Eugenio Silva, a Richmond automobile mechanic.

The indictment charged that Silva and Castelo bought ammunition that Acosta and Duarte took to Paraguay aboard a freighter that left from Deepwater Terminal in Richmond.

Castelo, a Paraguayan native who frequently traveled with the first lady on foreign trips, was charged earlier this month by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms with aiding and abetting the export of ammunitions without an export license. That charge was issued in a complaint and the additional charges were handed down by a grand jury that met in Norfolk.

No arraignment was scheduled, said Gregory Welsh, assistant U.S. attorney in Richmond.

The White House put Castelo on administrative leave Aug. 7 after learning that she had been charged.

Ammunition explosion shakes Afghan capital

By The Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Explosions tore through an army ammunition depot in the Afghan capital of Kabul Wednesday, igniting flames that rose more than 1,000 feet, Western diplomatic sources said.

There was no immediate word on casualties, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Kabul radio reported the explosions were the result of an accident, the sources said.

The Kabul government has been fighting a war against Moslem rebels since 1979, and the diplomats said there was no way to know if guerrillas were involved.

They said the depot belongs to the Afghan army's 8th Division and is located in the densely populated Qarga Lake area of Kabul.

Explosions were first heard late Tuesday and continued for more than five hours, rocking the city and shattering windows as far as 6 miles away, the sources said.

Mushroom clouds formed over the site, apparently after anti-aircraft weapons and missiles blew up, the sources said.

The depot was still burning out of control Wednesday, they said.

Afghan security forces erected a 1.5-mile security zone around the depot and barred entry to everyone except government and emergency personnel.

Ambulances were seen racing in an out of the area and many fire trucks were called to the scene.

Riggs

Riggs keeps a close eye on how well tickets are selling at the box office, the "breadbasket" of any auditorium. In order to attract the public to the box office, publicity is part of Riggs' job as well.

One of Riggs' concerns is making sure students know about the price reductions for performances, offered in a special student package at the beginning of this semester.

"In the past, student response (to the McCain tickets) has not been as good as we would like. For one thing, there was not enough publicity out to the students. Secondly, the prices were too high for students," Riggs said.

In order to overcome these obstacles, the McCain board and Riggs are continuing a special campaign. Five shows are being offered to students at the lowest possible prices with orchestra seating at $53.55 and lower-balcony seating at $45.05.

The student package consists of performances by the Houston Ballet, dancing "The Sleeping Beauty;" The Magic of David Copperfield; The Guthrie Theatre, performing "Candida," Airjazz, a group touting Juggling-Dance-Humor-Fun; and Cole Porter's Broadway Musical, "Can-Can."

"We want to get more students involved. If (some day) they have to take a client to the ballet or theater, they need to know how to talk about it. And it may be the only opportunity they have to experience the theater," Riggs said. "Let's let them make use of the opportunity while they are here."

Besides making sure people know about performances in McCain and making sure tickets sell, his duties also include negotiating performance contracts for the 1987-88 season. Press releases are sent daily to his office, and during September he will travel to St. Louis to the Association of College, University and Community Arts Administrators convention. At the convention, agents present their wares, prices are discussed, and Riggs presents the information to the McCain board and decisions are made. For the next two months, he is on the phone with agents negotiating every detail. In December there is another ACUCAA conference in New York where performances are confirmed if the homework has been done properly.

Riggs attended Memphis State University and graduated with a bachelor of Fine Arts in performance theater. The prgram emphasized all aspects of theater; technical as well as box office management. And Riggs has always "sorta had a yen for business."

"I'm moving away from the idea of teaching. I'm not sure that's all I want to do. Arts management is what you end up with by combining publicity and business. I stay involved and be just as happy as I can be," Riggs said.

Manhattan was a surprise to him. He knew the University would support its art programs, but he was surprised to find so much citywide involvement. Last year Riggs served as vice president of the Manhattan Civic Theater. In May he was elected to serve as president of the organization.

Riggs won't go to the conventions with any set notions about performances, although there have been some traditions set in McCain.

"People expect to see a ballet and the New York City Opera. But the tone of events changes with each director. In the past they were willing to change," Riggs said. "But the community tends to change. They expect a well-rounded program which is a showcase for the arts."

Hayden, Docking discuss agricultural issues

Staff/Andy Nelson

By RENEE BEAUDOIN
Government Editor

Kansas gubernatorial candidates Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, and Tom Docking, D-Topeka, faced off during a forum Thursday at the Manhattan Holidome.

Sponsored by the Kansas Farm Bureau as part of an Agriculture Media Conference, the forum centered on state agriculture issues. Both candidates responded to questions submitted by the media but no rebuttal time was given.

One strong difference between the two candidates surfaced on whether Kansas wheat should be marketed in South Africa.

"We should market our agriculture products as aggressively as possible, as long as we don't let it become a tool of foreign policy," Docking said.

Hayden had a different view of sales to South Africa.

"I am opposed to the sale of our products to South Africa," Hayden said. "If we can take a stand against apartheid we need to. We ought to take a stand for human rights and against apartheid. We need to be a leader against South Africa."

The two candidates also squared off on the subject of clear title legislation. The clear title issue concerns the law holding the buyer of a farm product with a loan outstanding on it responsible for the remainder owed.

When asked, Docking supported a central filing system, which would protect both the farmers (the borrowers) and the purchasers of the products.

Hayden also expressed an interest in working toward a central filing system.

"Clear title is an issue we've been concerned about for a long time," Hayden said.

In discussion concerning reorganization of the Kansas Secretary of Agriculture position, Hayden was opposed.

"I am opposed to the reorganization of the Board of Agriculture," he said. "The Secretary of Agriculture should be selected by the farmers of this state. We can reach these people through the various farming organizations around the state. As governor, I will not call for this reorganization."

Docking had a different view of the proposed reorganization.

"The motives which went behind the thought of reorganization was a concern that we lack an agriculture policy making board and we need this," Docking said.

Docking and Hayden gave similar statements about value-added industries in Kansas.

"Most of the new business in Kansas will come from existing small businesses. Recently Frito-Lay has been looking at new products which would increase their load. This is what we're talking about. Most will have to come from within with support and expertise supplied from our universities," Hayden said.

Docking said, "If we can get a major employer to come into the state we will aggressively pursue that, but the base of our growth is the smaller, the home-grown businesses."

On the subject of how federal tax reform will affect Kansas taxes, Hayden said he was in favor of simplifying the Kansas tax system

Students, police clash in S. African protest

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — University students threw stones Thursday at police and cars after leaving a meeting held to protest the police killings of 20 blacks in Soweto. The government promised to hold a public inquiry into the shootings.

Witnesses said police fired tear gas when students at the University of the Witwatersrand began throwing stones at police vans and other vehicles and at a police film crew. The university is officially for whites, but many blacks attend. Both blacks and whites were involved in the clash.

The South African Press Association said that one white student fired a gun into the air and that a police cameraman was injured when he was hit by a stone.

SAPA said about 1,000 students attended the protest meeting but only about 400 clashed with police.

The students were protesting the police shootings of 20 blacks during riots in the sprawling black township of Soweto on Tuesday night and Wednesday morning.

The government said Thursday that 20 blacks were killed by police and confirmed that a black Soweto councilor was killed by youths. It said 98 other people were injured.

Anti-apartheid leaders, however, said up to 30 people were killed and 200 wounded.

Deputy Information Minister Louis Nel told a news conference that a public investigation will be held and police will be questioned. He did not set a date for the inquiry but said, "It will not be delayed."

Nel said the Soweto riots were part of an organized campaign to sabotage the 11-week-old national state of emergency.

"It was an ambush to kill the police," he said. "They had to react to defend themselves. Whether they reacted correctly will be decided at the inquest."

About 50 riot police confronted the protesting students at the University of the Witwatersrand, SAPA said.

A dental student who was trying to drive away from the confrontation was mobbed and his car bumped into one protester, the agency said. It said students beat on the car's windows and roof, and the driver jumped out and fired a shot in the air.

He then sped away as stones were thrown at his car. SAPA said no one was injured by the car or the shot. It is common for whites in South Africa to carry guns in their cars.

The news agency said two police cameramen were hit with stones, and one of them was cut in the face.

Chernobyl to have 70-year effect

By The Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — An American doctor who treated Chernobyl victims said Thursday that health experts believe up to 75,000 people could die worldwide during the next 70 years from cancers caused by the Soviet nuclear plant disaster.

Dr. Robert Gale, a Los Angeles bone marrow specialist, said a minimum of 1,000 Chernobyl-related cancer deaths were expected worldwide, adding experts believe "the truth will lie between the extremes."

"We are discussing what the long-term implications could be, but unfortunately the range is very broad," he told The Associated Press. The estimates included projected deaths in the Soviet Union, he said.

Gale spoke during a lunch break at an International Atomic Energy Agency conference reviewing the April 26 Chernobyl accident.

Explosions and a fire in the No. 4 reactor at the facility in the Soviet Ukraine released radiation that spread worldwide. Soviet officials said 31 people died from the accident, hundreds were injured and more than 100,000 were evacuated.

Morris Rosen, the IAEA director of nuclear safety, said Tuesday that in the western Soviet Union alone, up to 25,000 people could die over the next 70 years of cancers caused by the accident.

Gale said Thursday that delegates at the conference agreed on this figure. Both Rosen and Gale, however, stressed that the actual number of deaths could be much lower.

The American doctor said 9.5 million cancer cases could be expected in the western Soviet Union over the next 70 years even without Chernobyl, and that by comparison the projections about Chernobyl-related cancer deaths were "not ... mind-boggling."

Gale also said he disagreed with recent Soviet conclusions that only an insignificant

Though a board of directors and a location have not been established, a home for unwed pregnant women is scheduled to open in Manhattan in January.

"They're looking at buildings now," Billye Martin, president of Manhattan Right to Life, said about the proposed home, Dream House Inc. at an informational meeting Thursday night in St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center, 711 Denison Ave.

"We're looking for a home that will house about 10 women plus a live-in family," she said.

For funding, the project depends on pledges and private donations, and whatever financial aid the residents will be able to provide, said Becky Kysar, newly elected vice president of Manhattan Right to Life.

The home is to be a privately funded, interdenominational organization, Kysar said.

Without specifying an amount, Kysar said she believes enough funds are available to open the house.

"The residents' costs will be based on their financial situations," she said.

Though a temporary board of three directors is needed until a permanent one can be elected in January, Martin was the only member elected at the meeting.

One person in attendance asked if a conflict of interest exists because of Martin's position in Right to Life, but the issue was dropped following a short discussion.

"I'm pro-life all the way, but so is Dream House," she said.

In her presentation of Dream House, Kysar said the residents would live in a "sorority-type" environment, and their only obligations would be to carry their pregnancies full-term and perform minor household duties at the home.

The major focus will be on unmarried college age women, she said, but the home will be licensed to handle minors if necessary.

Kysar said one of the reasons for establishing Dream House is the number of abortions performed in Riley County.

Quoting Riley County Health Department statistics, she said 162 abortions were performed in the county on women ages 15-24 in 1984.

Further statistics of the same age group showed that of the 459 live births, 54 babies were born out of wedlock, she said.

"We will strive to be non-judgmental while encouraging good moral principles," Kysar said.

Wefald says endowments may fund art museum in future

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

An art museum may be in K-State's future, President Jon Wefald said [illegible] University convocation Thursd[illegible]

"We will [illegible]k for endowments for an art muse[illegible]," he said. "KSU will have, soon[illegible]han later, an art museum."

However, [illegible]fald did not elaborate on a plan [illegible] museum at the convocation of [illegible]bout 900 faculty, staff and administration in McCain Auditorium.

In addressing the all-University gathering of employees, Wefald emphasized a change in attitude, saying the problems facing K-State can be solved.

"We need a change in attitude," he said. "A dean, faculty member or a college president can make a difference."

Problems of declining enrollment, retention, public image and funding decreases are all "correctable," Wefald said.

"We will stabilize enrollments," he said.

Wefald said using the newly hired recruiters would stem the decline in enrollment, because the recruiters would be visiting more high schools in the state.

"If you want the best students, you have to hit the road," Wefald said. "We were not visiting 40 to 50 percent of the high schools in the state (before hiring the new recruiters)."

The recruiters would be detailing the most recent achievements of the University in academics, Wefald said, citing the 12 Fulbright Scholars since 1976 and the current Rhodes Scholar as examples. He also said K-State was the only school in the state to have Truman Scholarship recipients this year.

"You can't get people to K-State on what you did 30 years ago, 20 years ago or even 10 years ago," Wefald said.

Retaining students once they attend the University is another problem that can be corrected, Wefald said.

The University needs its best professors teaching freshman and sophomores, Wefald said.

He asked the faculty and staff to cut red tape and bureaucracy. Students "don't need a run-around," he said.

"If a student comes to you (staff) with a problem, solve that problem," Wefald said.

"Don't greet a student with a negative attitude."

Wefald said retention and enrollment need to be stabilized before his administration can "talk seriously about long term goals or strategic policy."

He said he wanted to change policy from planning incrementally to planning strategically for the future.

For example, incremental planning occurs when the Legislature passes a 5 percent increase in the budget and all departments in the University are granted a 5 percent increase, he said.

Strategic planning would involve targeting money for those departments or programs judged to be a priority, Wefald said. In this case, one department would receive a 15 percent increase while another would get 2 percent.

"We have to make choices and set priorities," Wefald said. "We have to define flagship colleges" — those colleges identified as high priority.

Faculty and students would have a voice in the planning process, he said.

He also said the faculty is "top notch. We have the best deans in the Big Eight."

Wefald said he hopes the Board of Regents will also adopt programs for retraining faculty and enabling faculty to transfer directly from one university to another.

Denial of Playboy violates rights

WASHINGTON — The Librarian of Congress violated the Constitution when he refused to offer Playboy in Braille, a federal judge ruled Thursday.

U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan held that Daniel Boorstin ran afoul of the First Amendment because his decision to withhold the sexually-oriented men's magazine in Braille form was "...viewpoint oriented."

Hogan made the ruling in an oral decision announced from the bench. He will issue a written opinion at a later date.

The judge said Boorstin overruled his staff's recommendations to make the magazine available, and that the librarian said "he was doing so because he understood the sense of Congress was to eliminate Playboy, and he viewed that as a type of censorship."

"Despite his own views (that) he felt that was wrong, he still went ahead with what he thought the sense of Congress was."

Last year, Boorstin dropped Playboy from the list of 36 magazines that are produced and distributed in Braille for handicapped readers after Congress, on a vote of 216-193, voted to cut $103,000 from the library's annual $1.3 million budget — the exact amount it costs to produce 1,000 12-month subscriptions to Playboy.

The magazine had been published monthly in Braille since 1970 under the 54-year-old National Library Service for the Blind and Physically Handicapped. None of the other 35 magazines printed in Braille was dropped.

EPA warns public against chemical

WASHINGTON — The Environmental Protection Agency said Thursday that the insecticide-herbicide dinoseb — widely used on fields of soybeans, potatoes, cotton and peanuts — may cause birth defects.

The agency warned pregnant women to avoid contact with the toxic agricultural chemical.

The EPA said it has received studies indicating dinoseb has caused irreversible neurological and skeletal malformations in the offspring of lab animals exposed to the chemical.

EPA's announcement also said other studies show dinoseb causing sterility in male rats and mice. But Al Heier, an agency spokesman, said officials believe dinoseb poses less risk to men than it does to pregnant women.

For women, Heier said, the biggest danger appears to lie in the first three months of pregnancy — a time when some women do not know they are pregnant.

Deputy EPA Administrator James Barnes said the agency plans to take prompt steps to regulate dinoseb, which is an active ingredient in about 180 commercial products, none of them intended for use by homeowners.

Heier said that the regulatory steps could be as strong as a ban on dinoseb if the agency concludes its risks to humans greatly outweigh its value to farmers.

Barnes said in a prepared statement that "the dangerous routes of exposure (to dinoseb) are inhalation and skin absorption by people applying the pesticide in the field."

Two convicted of threatening Dole

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Two state prison inmates accused of threatening Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole with a makeshift, unworkable letter bomb were convicted on two counts in U.S. District Court Thursday.

The letter mailed to the Kansas Republican's Washington office from the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing in March contained wiring and some ground-up match heads. Officials agreed the letter was not capable of exploding.

Jurors who got the case Wednesday afternoon deliberated five hours and returned verdicts Thursday against David J. Leaverton, 29, and David E. Nicholson, 39.

The two men were found guilty of using the mail to threaten to kill, injure, or intimidate someone with an explosive, a felony, and of a misdemeanor offense of illegally sending inflammable material through the mail, without intent to injure.

Kansas man wins suit against rail

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A Russell man who was injured on a railroad freight car has been awarded more than $750,000 in damages.

U.S. District Judge Dale E. Saffels awarded $788,989 Wednesday to Randall J. Miller, who claimed in a suit that his foot was crushed in November 1983 at an Agco Inc. plant in Russell County.

The suit said Miller was working at Agco when he climbed onto a Union Pacific Railroad Co. freight car walkway that gave way. The suit said he fell and his foot was trapped behind the couple of the freight car. The suit said Miller's right foot was smashed when the freight car coupled with another car.

A federal court jury found Union Pacific at fault in the accident Wednesday. The judge ordered the railroad to pay damages and attorney fees.

Bolivian government declares seige

LA PAZ, Bolivia — The government Thursday declared a nationwide state of siege and arrested scores of labor and church leaders in response to widespread protests against the closing of mines and economic austerity measures.

The government imposed a midnight to 6 a.m. curfew, banned political and union activity, gave security forces the power to make arrests without judicial orders and prohibited travel between cities, officials said.

It was the second siege enacted by the government within a year to crush labor unrest. The protests were sparked by government austerity measures designed to revive an economy battered by falling word commodity prices and high inflation. U.S.-assisted raids on cocaine labs also have hurt the economy of this impoverished nation in the heart of South America.

Divestiture legislation ready; California to sell investments

By The Associated Press

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Legislation that Gov. George Deukmejian is expected to sign would require the state to sell an estimated $11 billion or more worth of investments in companies doing business in South Africa.

The divestment bill went to the governor Wednesday on a 50-26 vote of the state Assembly after 2½ hours of debate.

Deukmejian almost immediately issued a statement saying: "California Thursday sent a clear, unequivocal message to the racist government in South Africa. California's action is morally right and fiscally sound, because if apartheid is not ended soon, business investments in that country will suffer great losses."

The governor, who is up for re-election, had vetoed a milder version of the bill last year.

Party attracts 300 downtown to kick-off fall sports season

About 300 people mingled in the downtown streets as the first Purple Pride Party began with a free watermelon feed and a pork barbecue Thursday night.

The Purple Pride Party was a joint effort initiated by the Manhattan Main Street Project, an organization designed to restore and revitalize the downtown district, and the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"It's a great link with the University and downtown," said Cindy Yankovich, marketing director of the Manhattan Main Street project. "As the athletic department is rebuilding, so is the downtown. It's a great joint effort.

"I think the event was an overwhelming success," Yankovich said. "Since this was a first event, we didn't know what to expect; now we know and we plan to make this an annual event."

The K-State Pep Band and Wildcat Cheerleaders led a pep rally with the traditional K-State fight song, as part of the scheduled activities.

"It's a tremendous way to kick-off the sports season. Our players are excited for it, and we're looking forward to going out and giving our support Saturday," basketball coach Lon Kruger said.

Several football and basketball players attended the street party, giving the community a chance to meet the sports figures before the start of the season.

"This kind of an event gives the people in the community a chance to come out and meet the players, and it's good for us since a lot of us are from out-of-town," said Ron Meyer, junior in arts and sciences and K-State basketball player.

'As the athletic department is rebuilding, so is the downtown. It's a great joint effort.'

"It's nice to know the community will come out on a cool night to meet the players. It helps show us (the football players) we have support everywhere," said Kevin Humphrey, junior in social sciences and K-State football player.

"We need community support and we like to show the community we care, and we do need their support," Humphrey said.

"This is a great and very positive event. We need to do more of it," said Athletic Director Larry Travis. "This is a joint operation with K-State and Manhattan, and I'm glad the athletic department had a little part in it."

Republican gubernatorial candidate wants mediation for failing farms

By RENEE BEAUDOIN
Government Editor

Mediation is the key to helping with the problem of farm foreclosures, said House Speaker Mike Hayden in an interview Thursday.

Hayden, Republican candidate for governor, was in Manhattan to participate in a forum on agriculture issues with Democratic opponent Tom Docking.

"Both in Iowa and Minnesota the extension service has been used extensively in working on mediation on farm foreclosures. Now, mediation is third party intervention, someone who sits down with the borrower and the lender and trys to get them to work out some sort of reasonable restructuring," Hayden said.

He said in these states mediation is required before a foreclosure can occur.

"If that's the law then the banks, or any lenders will pay attention to it," he said.

"Farm foreclosures are a terrible tragedy. They ruin families and they ruin family farms. They take people out of rural areas," Hayden said. "We have to do everything we can to make foreclosures a last resort."

Another of Hayden's concerns is the fate of interest buy-downs, a method used to take care of outstanding debts in a foreclosure case. Currently, debts forgiven in the process are defined as income by the Internal Revenue Service.

Hayden said this money should not be considered taxable income.

"You have to remember that those are only on classified loans. Those are the guys who are already in difficult financial conditions. If you tax them, that's just the straw that broke the camel's back," he said.

"The whole interest buy-down program is to provide relief. If you turn right around and tax that then you're defeating the whole purpose of the legislation," he said.

Hayden voted for legislation which called for a three-year partial moratorium on farm foreclosures. This passed the Legislature but was declared unconstitutional by the courts.

The decision, now under appeal, held the law unconstitutional because it was retroactive. The partial moratorium passed in April, but applied to cases back to Jan. 1.

Hayden said jobs for Kansans is a "major priority," and he will be working for Kansas jobs.

"Let me tell you that the real good studies show two things. They show that 80 percent of new jobs are going to come from small business and the vast majority from existing small business.

"That tells you something important. That tells you that most of our growth is going to come from within, with the expansion of existing Kansas business and with the use of Kansas capital," he said.

"We have to remember that 80 percent of the jobs come from businesses that employ less than 200 people," Hayden said.

Scavenging law to exclude police

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A proposed garbage control ordinance that would restrict trash-can scavengers would not apply to law enforcement officers searching for clues, according to an amendment offered to the Kansas City Council Wednesday.

Councilman Jim Heeter, a cosponsor of the proposed ordinance, recommended the exemption after the proposal caught the attention of federal prosecutors and local police officials, who say they sometimes need to sift through the trash of suspects during investigations.

The original proposal, among other things, would make it illegal to remove refuse from a trash container without permission of the owner. The proposal, which has met with opposition from social advocates, was held over for further hearing.

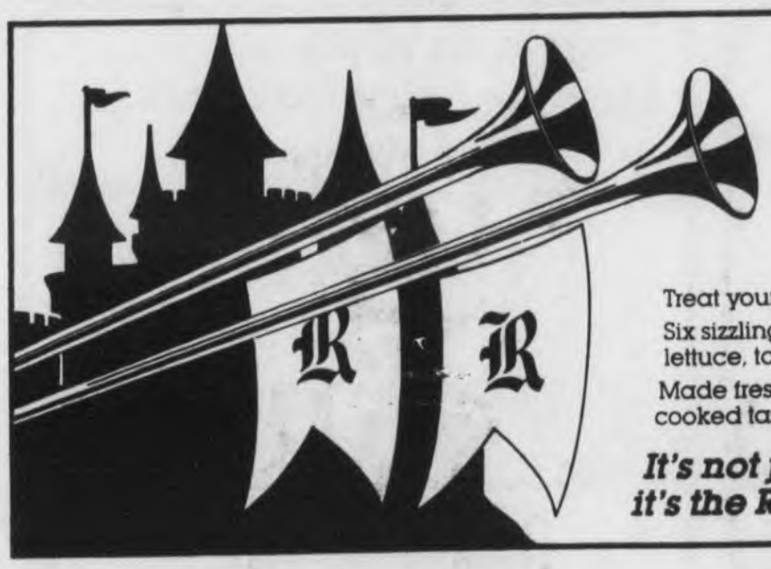
U.S. Attorney Robert Ulrich and Michael Wee, counsel for the Kansas City Police Department, welcomed the amendment Wednesday.

"We've had a number of cases in the past where we've had to look at receptacles to obtain information," Ulrich said. "There's occasionally a need in law enforcement to look at what people discard."

Wee said the amendment "recognizes the existence of that investigative technique, and it removes the possibility for conflict between the courts and city ordinance."

Others were critical about the anti-scavenging proposal.

The Rev. Stuart Whitney, chairman of a task force on homelessness, said restrictions in the ordinance would cut off some transients from a livelihood built on collecting aluminum cans and other scraps.



"This type of provision, particularly the scavenging provision, could well be the prelude to other restrictions," he said. "The poor and the homeless do not need more of their rights denied."

Councilman John Sharp argued that the restrictions would place additional hardships on people who have slipped through the welfare system.

"Are we going to get written up in Doonesbury if we pass this?" Sharp asked in reference to the comic strip that has lampooned an anti-transient law in Santa Barbara, Calif.

"There are serious holes in the safety net," he added. "I'd hate to see something that makes it illegal for someone to survive when our social welfare efforts are so inadequate."

But the proposed ordinance has been endorsed by several neighborhood groups that complained of strewn garbage and trash bags left out on sidewalks days before collection. The proposal also would prohibit residents from depositing garbage in another person's trash container.

New president shows refreshing enthusiasm

Overflowing with patriotic fervor is one way to describe new University President Jon Wefald.

Storming onto campus with fresh enthusiasm, the new president has shown impulsiveness, but so far has carried through the impulses with action — for example, redecoration of the Union and painting campus trash cans purple.

In a convocation Thursday, Wefald infected the crowd with his enthusiasm. His statements were positive and progressive, yet he did not avoid mentioning the problems K-State faces: declining enrollment, retention, public image and funding decreases.

Wefald proclaimed each of the problems "correctable," and cited the hiring of nine new recruiters as the first of many steps toward correcting the problems.

Wefald is making some big plans for his new adminstration. Five years from now students and faculty will look back on his remarks to see if his words were put into action. He may not carry out all of his plans, but future K-Staters should note improvements.

U.S. pressure needed against South Africa

As the most powerful nation in the world, the policies of the United States carry heavy influence.

Wielding the sword of U.S. power, the Reagan administration could cut the strength of the oppressive Botha regime in South Africa with a decisive swing — increased sanctions.

At least 12 blacks were shot to death Wednesday in an escalation of violence in Soweto. A bloody revolution is predicted by the neighboring nations of South Africa.

Congress supports full sanctions against South Africa, but President Reagan offered a compromise of less severe sanctions in addition to those already imposed. Judging by failure of full sanctions against Libya, Reagan's policy of increasing sanctions one step at a time seems logical.

Additional sanctions are necessary, if not full scale. The United States must support human rights over its own economic or strategic interests. If blacks eventually come to power in South Africa, they will remember the course the United States chooses.

Beer Patrol abducts local drinkers

LILLIAN ZIER
Editorial Page Editor

Watch out K-State partiers — it's the Beer Patrol!

These ill-reputed characters are invading Manhattan — Aggieville in particular — in increasing numbers. Because they are known to have a fetish for youth, older students are not to be alarmed, but younger students, even though they may be experienced drinkers, should beware.

The beer patrol is not easily recognizable. They do not frequent bars wearing ankle-length trenchcoats, fedoras and John Belushi sunglasses. They do, however, travel in groups of two or three, one wearing an armored vest, fatigues and carrying an automatic. The others are dressed to blend with the college crowd — jeans, a white tank and no socks — and serve as body guards for the one who resembles Sylvester Stallone.

Although they initially appear about as dangerous as a flasher on Halloween in Aggieville, they must be regarded with suspicion. They have been caught preying on women age 19 or younger who are vulnerable when under the influence of alcohol. It was reported that these characters recently abducted women fitting this description from an Aggieville bar after the women refused to share their pitcher.

The beer patrol should be avoided at all costs. Because they may be disguised as normal college-age male predators, underage women may only be safe by remaining sober in public. Underage men are equally vulnerable to attack by the beer patrol as they are usually frequenting the vicinity of the underage women.

Partiers under the age of 20 may not even be safe in their own home. Like Bill Murray hunting phantoms in "Ghostbusters," the beer patrol can detect and trap young drinkers at any time in any place.

Victims kidnapped from private parties can only negotiate their own rescue through paying ransom, sometimes as little as $25. Young partiers captured in public may be forced to pay up to $5,000 if taken while carrying an older friend's ID, which bears some sort of value to the beer patrol. It is said patrol members hunt the owner of the ID and take his or her first-born child — further evidence of the youth fetish.

Care is to be taken at private parties, and especially at fraternity parties. The beer patrol is not frightened by large masses of people dressed in green and purple knee-length shorts. Spies posted along Sunset Avenue will report gatherings of the previously described group to the beer patrol who will then invade the meeting and abduct 18 and 19 year olds holding plastic cups.

Ludicrous as it may sound, this threat is a reality. Kansas is suffering from an attack of morality. As the disease develops, Kansas legislators feverishly invent new laws against activities many residents never considered wrong.

Not to rekindle McCarthyism, but the situation has all the symtoms of Communism — Big Brother covertly watching and taking note of the intimate details of citizens' social activities.

Admittedly, students — particularly younger students — have a propensity to overindulge and possibly do damage to public property and their own health. Such behavior warrants monitoring. The purpose of the Kansas Alcoholic Beverage Control Unit is to enforce the state's liquor laws. But the ABC's methods are juvenile. The beer patrol shows more interest in harassing students and creating a threatening image than enforcing the law.

John Lamb, state director of the ABC, described a recent crackdown in the city as "more of a visibility type thing" and said enough arrests were made to "prove to people that they could be arrested." Those who were arrested probably knew they were taking that chance before they drank illegally, but that didn't stop them.

The ABC should concentrate on prevention, unless their primary goal is to fill jails with young people. Preventing underage people from drinking could be accomplished simply by the ABC's open, undisguised presence in Aggieville.

As far as entering private parties to find underage drinkers, what is the purpose if no one is disturbing the peace or creating other havoc? The people throwing the party are responsible for their own property, which they are not likely to want destroyed, therefore they are responsible for the underage people at the party. Many parents allow their teen-age children to drink at home in a controlled environment — the premise is similar.

Students will be less likely to fight a system that is not waging a cold war with them.

Hay fever diminishes Aggieville excitement

JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Imagine sitting in a local club, innocently searching for a gorgeous man or woman, but instead seeing me, eyes squinted, throat tightened, Adam's apple moving up and down, all to the tune of what sounds like a frog croaking.

That is my way of "scratching" an itchy throat brought on by a hay fever attack. If you were in Bushwacker's the Wednesday before classes started, you may have seen me perform this act.

My intention was to enjoy a wild night of partying; my sinuses had different plans. The misery began as I was halfway through my second beer. The hay fever pill I had taken was mixing with the alcohol, and made me feel like I had been up for at least 48 hours.

Hay fever is an allergic reaction to some types of pollen, and pollen comes from flowers and weeds, which flourish around Manhattan. Antihistamines are taken to lessen the effects of hay fever including headaches, itchy eyes, runny nose and scratchy throat. An article in this month's issue of Family Circle stated, "The well-known side effects of antihistamines — similar to walking underwater — can leave you feeling drowsy, weak and wiped out."

I was with four other people and did not want to seem like a bore, so I put down my beer, glued my eyelashes to my brow and attempted to perk up.

Try carrying on an intelligent conversation after walking underwater awhile.

I was just getting the hang of sleeping with my eyes open when the four-hour antihistamine I had taken two hours ago began to wear off. Ever so slowly, like a nail screeching across a long chalkboard, my throat started to itch.

I excused myself and stumbled, nose dripping, to the restroom in search of a hay fever pill which I had failed to carry with me. I knew if I didn't get one soon, the attack would overcome me.

After approaching every woman in sight and asking for the priceless drug without success, I blew my nose and wearily staggered back to my table, nearly tripping on an unseen chair leg.

Why did I suddenly feel like a lone sufferer in a sea of pollen?

I slouched down in my seat and tried to remain in control, hoping my sneezing would distract my attention from the nagging itch, but finally the urge to "scratch" became uncontrollable.

I attempted to look inconspicuous as my face distorted and my throat started making that awful noise caused by my Adam's apple convulsing in an attempt to relieve the internal itch. I scratched my throat until it was numb, and then, as the itch crept back, repeated the routine until my throat was too sore to move.

I left the bar, exhausted and angry that my night was spent in a battle of the sinuses.

A couple of days later, my roommates decided to save some money, turn off the air conditioner and open the windows. I'm all for saving money and had already voiced my quota of hay fever complaints, so I silently grabbed my third antihistamine pill for the day.

I'm not the best martyr, though, and after a few hours of breathing fresh pollen, I shut the windows and turned on the air conditioner.

By Saturday, I was so sick of dealing with hay fever that I decided to overdose on pills. I didn't want my last night of partying before classes to be disrupted by an attack.

The antihistamines were very effective; I conked out by 10 p.m.

What happened to me last week, and continues to plague me, is not unusual. I go through this every year. After spending the summer in Kansas City, a move to Manhattan sends my sinuses soaring. And I'm not alone; every hay fever stricken individual, goes through a similar experience.

I know you non-sufferers are probably sick of hearing us blowing our noses, cursing our sneezes and sleeping through almost anything, aside from hay fever attacks, but bear with us.

After that first frost, most of the pollen will die and our boxes of Puffs will lie dormant until the next season's pollen begins its ruthless war.

Chaos pervades first days of class

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

The week I dreaded has almost gone — the first week of classes — and I'd like to share a few observations from my very average viewpoint.

— I didn't remember there were so many of us.

Working an evening job for the Collegian this summer, I didn't have much of an opportunity to observe the number of campus residents during the day. It's been quite a shock this week to have been jostled and surrounded by the returning "hordes."

Don't get me wrong. The hustle and bustle of this campus is really a welcome sight. And I wouldn't change it for anything, unless to add a few to the crowd.

— May I make one suggestion as you make your way through this wandering maze we call K-State?

Ignore all suggestions not to wear purple and white on campus.

If you've got it, wear it. I happen to like seeing Willie Wildcat T-shirts. Besides showing a modicum of school spirit and pride, those T-shirts are probably the most comfortable thing in your closet.

— Speaking of Willie Wildcat, my sympathy to Willie for the weather he had to endure during registration.

With shoulder pads and fur, he was undoubtedly more uncomfortable than those stuck behind the tables in Ahearn Field House assisting the mob of students through that (orderly) chaos.

— As for registration, the mob scene seemed a bit more spread out than in past years. We all didn't try to make it through those lines at the same time.

The music and candy were good ideas that didn't quite work. Considering the heat and the amount of money we had to part with, those little amenities were probably unnecessary.

I liked the idea of the music but would have preferred listening to a more upbeat type of music. The faster beat may have persuaded the "hordes" to move through more quickly or at least allowed us to dance a little while we waited.

As for a choice of station, what happened to K-State unity and purple pride? We should have been listening to our own KSDB instead of another station.

By the way, the oldies are returning to KSDB beginning tonight from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. Hurrah!

— Along with forgetting the sheer magnitude of our population, I'd forgotten how wide this campus is.

My summer job was rather sedentary and my feet are letting me know that was a mistake. I should have kept walking. It's going to take weeks for my feet to like me again!

The following two statements are my chance to air a couple of grievances with this week. Bear with me — I really have to say something!

— It's too bad so many of us require financial assistance for our higher education. What's even worse is when that assistance system fails.

I realize the percentage of error is relatively small compared to the number of students wandering through that particular maze. But it is extremely frustrating when it is your check that is among that relatively small percentage of "goofs."

— My second gripe I just have to say something about is the Union.

Hopefully the remodeling in the cafeteria will be done soon and we can judge for ourselves if the improvements are really that. The lines are still confusing, there's less space between the checkout lines and the tables, and it's still chaos at lunchtime.

My major complaint is the lack of space but Thursday that seemed to be a little better.

My second complaint has to be the cups! (I'll never say another word after this, I promise.)

The new plastic cups may be easier to store and less expensive but they are not better.

The clear plastic is not insulated — the ice melts before you reach Kedzie — it "sweats" and is hard to hold onto, and, I think, the cups don't hold as much as the insulated cups of long ago.

Plus if you look at the K-State pride angle — these clear plastic cups are rather ordinary.

OK, end of gripe session.

What follows are a couple of terrific mind photographs I wish you were able to share.

— The pinnacle of Nichols Hall silhouetted against a star-filled blue-black night sky.

— A 3-year-old boy following his mother — he's dressed in a T-shirt and jeans tucked into oversized brown cowboy boots. His blond hair is partially hidden by a lopsided battered child-size cowboy hat and he's carrying a foot-high plant in front of him, talking the entire time. Adorable!

— A young mother auditioning for "Oklahoma!" with a tiny baby in her arms. I just hope she continues to expose her children to the fine arts — the little ones will grow up to appreciate the finer things in life. It's a lesson all parents, and even those of us not yet parents, ought to learn.

Let your children see the world's beauty and hear the music.

Soweto

At a news conference earlier Thursday, anti-apartheid leaders challenged the government version of what set off the Soweto riots and demanded authorities allow a mass funeral for the victims.

Mass funerals frequently have been prohibited because they often become forums for anti-apartheid protests.

The Rev. Frank Chikane, deputy president of the anti-apartheid Soweto Civic Association, and Murphy Morobe, chief spokesman of the United Democratic Front, the country's largest anti-apartheid coalition, said up to 30 people were killed and 200 wounded.

"We are appalled and outraged by this cold-blooded massacre," Chikane told a news conference.

Even the government's lower figures made the riots the bloodiest reported in any 24-hour period in a black township since 1960.

It was the most serious outbreak of violence since the government declared the state of emergency June 12 and gave police powers to arrest people without charge.

Chikane and Morobe said the violence began Tuesday night when police fired without provocation on blacks leaving a meeting that discussed the Soweto town council's campaign to evict blacks taking part in a rent boycott. The government-supported black council owns most of the township's housing, and rent is its only source of income.

The government said the violence began when a crowd at a street barricade threw a hand grenade at police, injuring four officers.

University President Jon Wefald speaks Thursday afternoon at a University convocation in McCain Auditorium. Wefald called the convocation to speak to all the University employees on present problems he sees with K-State and how they can be corrected.

Wefald

Faculty pay is of the "utmost importance," Wefald said.

K-State faculty are paid 12 percent less than the national average for its peer institutions, he said.

The Regents needs to fund higher salaries for the system's schools, Wefald said.

However, a positive attitude toward the Kansas Legislature and governor should be taken, he said.

Referring to 7 percent cuts in funding for Oklahoma schools and 4 percent reductions in Iowa, Wefald said the 2 percent cuts in Kansas made it "an island in the middle" of the other states.

"The future of the state is inseparably tied to higher education," he said.

"What is good for K-State is good for the state of Kansas."

On the topic of K-State's public image, Wefald emphasized the positive attributes of the University.

"Public image is what you make it," Wefald said.

K-State has a good, worldwide reputation in many programs such as engineering and agriculture, he said.

"Academic excellence has to be ranked No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, No. 4, No. 5."

"Our students are better and better all the time," Wefald said.

Wefald took over the office of president of the University July 1, occupying the position vacated by the resignation of Duane Acker.

He has stressed the importance of K-State's image, referring to the University as "the best kept secret in Kansas."

Film classic remake has few good scenes

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

The buzz is back, whether we want it or not. But this time, instead of going for an all-out horror movie, director Tobe Hooper and screenwriter L.M. Kit Carson have fashioned a tongue-in-cheek horror film, "Texas Chainsaw Massacre Part 2," that is not nearly as dreadfully realistic as the original cult classic made more than a decade ago.

Film Review

This time the accent is on parody, as indicated by the newspaper ads which show the family of killers posed like the preppie teenagers in John Hughes' "The Breakfast Club."

The movie opens with two college students speeding down the highway in their gold Mercedes, blasting away at road signs with a hand gun. But then they make a mistake and play chicken with a pickup, something the occupants of the pickup don't take kindly. Soon afterward a chainsaw starts hacking away at the Mercedes' roof.

The scene is so absurd that it's funny, but at the same time director Hooper creates some real terror. Unfortunately, after this scene preppies are never again the target of the parody. Without this angle the movie lacks a focus and degenerates into little more than just another mad-slasher film.

The movie still has some good isolated moments. One such scene comes when Dennis Hooper (as an ex-Texas state trooper) checks out the goods at a chainsaw store, picking out a few choice models and swinging them like swords. He ends up heading into battle with the killers, one chainsaw on each hip as if he were a gunfighter.

Tobe Hooper had the potential to fashion a wild parody of other slasher films, but in the end, after the movie's heroine has been screaming solidly for nearly 30 minutes, the movie's unpleasant side overwhelms the tongue-in-cheek tone.

Air Force destructs missile during test

By The Associated Press

VANDENBERG AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — An unarmed intercontinental ballistic missile was blown up during a test flight over the Pacific Ocean on Thursday because of an undisclosed problem, the Air Force said.

"The destruct signal was sent well into the missile's 30 minute test flight," said Tech. Sgt. Fred Bolinger of the 1st Strategic Aerospace Division's public affairs staff at Vandenberg.

The 78,000-pound Minuteman 3 missile, an ICBM capable of carrying explosives to three separate targets, lifted off from an underground silo at 7:04 a.m. for its 30-minute flight across the Pacific Ocean to the Kwajalein Atoll, Sgt. Fred Bolinger said.

"An anomaly occurred during the flight which cause the early termination," Bolinger said.

A team of Air Force and Department of Defense contractor engineers was investigating.

It was not immediately known how close the 60-foot-tall missile got to its target before the destruct command was given, the spokesman said.

Bolinger said ther was no danger to anyone in the ocean area where the rocket fell. Its altitude at the time was not disclosed.

The aborted ICBM flight comes at a time when America's space program and missile program has been plagued by failures.

Those include the Jan. 28 shuttle explosion in Florida that killed seven Challenger crew members; the April 18 blow-up of a Titan missile carrying a spy satellite over Vandenberg; the April 25 failure of a Nike-Orion rocket at White Sands, N.M.; the May 3 destruction of an out-of-control Delta rocket in Florida; and last Saturday's destruction of an Aries rocket carrying an X-ray telescope from White Sands.

The last time a Minuteman 3 was destroyed was on Feb. 5, 1985, Bolinger said. Since that time, there have been 10 successful Minuteman launches. Another failure had occurred in February 1983. The cause of those failures was not disclosed.

Frontier ends wait, files for bankruptcy

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Frontier Airlines filed for Chapter 11 reorganization Thursday in U.S. Bankruptcy Court, ending five days of speculation about the fate of the grounded carrier, a subsidiary of People Express Inc.

United Airlines, which had been the most serious bidder for the Denver-based carrier, on Wednesday dropped its $146 million bid. Frontier stopped flying on Sunday, stranding thousands of passengers across the nation.

"The decision to file a bankruptcy petition was made only after we had exhausted every other available alternative, including the possible sale of Frontier to parties other than United Airlines," said Donald C. Burr, chairman of the Newark, N.J.-based People Express.

"None of the airlines or other financially responsible entities we spoke to was willing to make an offer for Frontier as a whole," he said. "With respect to United Airlines, we offered to take a drastic reduction in price if United would complete its acquisition of Frontier, but United was unwilling to proceed with the transaction."

Airline officials said it was costing People Express $1 million per day in overhead and leases to maintain Frontier's grounded fleet and idle facilities.

People Express has been saying for days that it would file bankruptcy papers on Frontier this week.

Robert Joedicke, an airline analyst for the New York investment firm Shearson Lehman Brothers Inc., had said earlier that even if Frontier filed under Chapter 11 to reorganize, he did not see how it would possible to be put back into operation.

"It has no working capital left. Their remaining assets are not of great magnitude," Joedicke said.

People Express, the discount airline company that bought Frontier in November as part of an ill-fated expansion, shut it down Sunday because Frontier had run out of money and faced an immediate $5 million payment.

Frontier reportedly lost an average of $10 million a month during the first six months of this year and put heavy pressure on People Express.

United failed to reach agreement with the Air Line Pilots Association on a timetable for merging Frontier pilots into United's 60 percent higher pay scale.

Professor credits students for success

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

Being named Professor of the Year might be considered a personal achievement, but Richard Consigli, professor of biology, credits his students for his success.

"The commitment of the students is what does it," Consigli said. "It makes you feel good to be able to produce students who are better than yourself."

For the second straight year Consigli has won a silver medal award in the professor of the year competition sponsored by the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education. A professor must teach undergraduate classes to be eligible for the award.

Consigli is teaching one undergraduate class, Principles of Biology Recitation, and two graduate classes, Biology of the Cancer Cell and Advanced Virology.

Consigli is the only K-State professor ever to win the award, which is given for excellence in teaching, and the only professor in Kansas to receive the honor this year. The award presentation will coincide with National Higher Education Week, Oct. 25-31.

He was nominated for the award by former President Duane Acker and other administrators who sent supporting letters to CASE, said Cheryl May, University Relations deputy managing editor. Former students also sent letters to the council, she said.

Consigli's students agree he deserves the award. Susan Marriot, graduate student in biology, has taken two of Consigli's graduate classes and praises his efforts and willingness to help students. She received her doctorate Monday in microbiology with an emphasis in virology having worked in Consigli's research lab.

"He can explain the most difficult subjects and help you understand anything," she said. "He is concerned about you, even your personal life."

Brian Spooner Jr. and Dan Roeder, undergraduate students who work in Consigli's lab, agree with Marriot.

"He really cares about your problems," Spooner said.

"It's a good learning atmosphere because there is no heavy pressure," Roeder said. "He makes us feel at home."

Still, Consigli insists that students are the backbone of the University especially in the graduate program.

"The difference between any junior college, college and university is the graduate programs," he said. "The graduate students are leading the way on the frontier of technology."

Consigli said although most people think of K-State as a university to attend for a four-year curriculum, the graduate programs are just as important.

In addition to teaching undergraduate and graduate classes, Consigli has done research on the polyoma virus and other viruses since coming to the University in 1962.

"As a research scientist he has brought in a tremendous amount of research money to the University," May said. "He is vitally important to cancer research in the nation."

Consigli has been responsible for drawing in more than $2 million in research grants during his tenure. Most of the grants are funded through the National Cancer Institute.

He points to the increase in technology as a great learning tool in the research lab.

"Because of this (technology), we are able to learn something new every day in the lab," he said.

The blend of teaching and research is what makes his job so enjoyable, Consigli said.

"I enjoy teaching, but I would not stay here without the graduate program and research that I do."

Urban Board suggests Kimball area rezoning

By The Collegian Staff

Manhattan Urban Planning Board has recommended annexation of a strip of land in order to extend the paved surface of Kimball Avenue.

If approved by the Manhattan City Commission, the annexation will allow the formation of a benefit district to pay for the paving of Kimball west from where the pavement ends west of Plymouth Road.

City Planner Larry Hulse said the costs of paving the street will be assessed to the property. Todd Thalmann, design supervisor for the Manhattan City Engineering Department, said the maximum probable cost for the paving project is $100,000.

A public hearing is scheduled for Oct. 7 to determine if the property should be annexed. If the property is annexed by the city, it would be rezoned for single-family units, as is most of the surrounding property.

During the summer, residents along the graveled portion petitioned the city to have it paved. The property on the other side of the street, however, has not yet been annexed.

Therefore, the city immediately initiated a unilateral annexation of the property, owned by Alvin Abbott. A unilateral annexation is one originated by the city when the owner of the property does not request the annexation himself.

Hulse said the area of land has been planned for residential development, and that this fits into the city's growth plan.

Hulse said Abbott has expressed his concern about pavement farther west along his property because a portion of the land is located in a flood plain and the area would not be easily developed for a residential tract.

"There is a flood plain that goes along there (the area to be annexed)," said Eric Cattell of the city planning office. "There are some unbuildable areas out there, that's for sure. But the area they're thinking of annexing for the street to be able to get the benefit district off the ground...is only for the street. It's only about a 100 foot strip."

Cattell said this strip did not run into the flood plain.

The Manhattan Mercury reported that the Riley County Commission Thursday approved an application requesting a $326,000 grant from the Kansas Department of Transportation. If the state grants the money for the project, the county will be expected to match that money with $115,000.

Meatpackers reach tentative agreement

By The Associated Press

AUSTIN, Minn. — A tentative contract has been reached to end the bitter meatpackers strike against Hormel's flagship plant, and a town leader said Thursday it should enable residents to "start rebuilding our community."

Larry Haugen, head of the local Chamber of Commerce, said he hoped the settlment would bring business back to normal following the costly and sometimes violent yearlong walkout.

Negotiators for the United Food and Commercial Workers union and Geo. A. Hormel & Co. reached the tentative agreement Wednesday night in Des Moines, Iowa, where talks had been held for eight days.

Under the agreement, wages would be restored to levels above wage cuts implemented by Hormel in 1984, said Joe Hansen, a union negotiator. Hansen said the agreement is patterned after one reached last weekend at Oscar Mayer & Co. that will pay workers $10.70 an hour by the third year of a three-year contract.

Hansen was appointed trustee to oversee operations of the union's Local P-9 in Austin after the local refused a directive from the international union to end its strike.

Union Vice President Lewie G. Anderson, labor's chief negotiator, said the proposed settlement would increase the base wage of $10 an hour to $10.25 in the first year, $10.50 the second year and $10.70 the third year.

In addition, a two-tier wage system in the Austin plant would be phased out over the length of the contract, Anderson said. Strikers who returned to work receive $10 an hour, while new employees receive $8 an hour. New employees receive $8.50 an hour after six months and $9 an hour after a year.

The union also had been pushing for a common expiration date for eight Hormel plants. Anderson said the contract would run four years at the Austin plant and three years at the other plants. After that, the union could determine the expiration date, he said.

"This settlement is one of the best settlements in the industry," Anderson said.

Hormel Senior Vice President Chuck Nyberg said Thursday: "We're glad that the negotiation process has been concluded. Both parties had to give and we are pleased the process is over, but I don't think either party will think that the contract is exactly what they wanted."

Hormel workers were paid base wages of $10.69 an hour until Hormel instituted a cut to $8.25 an hour in October 1984. Most wages have since been restored to $10 an hour.

Negotiators reached similar agreements covering seven other Hormel plants where contracts expire Sept. 1, Hansen said. Those plants are in Beloit, Wis.; Algona, Iowa; Fremont, Neb.; Charlotte, N.C.; Dallas, Houston and Atlanta.

Hansen said ratification of the agreement by rank-and-file union members is expected to occur in Austin next week at the earliest. Union negotiators for the other seven plants will review the settlement with their members this weekend, he said.

Company and union negotiators have yet to determine how many P-9 members will be recalled to work in the plant, he said.

The strike by some 1,400 Local P-9 members began Aug. 17, 1985. Hormel reopened the plant Jan. 13 and hired about 600 non-union replacement workers. After that, about 500 union members returned to work.

Physics receives computer; complements existing units

By JADA ALLERHEILIGEN
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Physics has a "good problem" — finding space for 1,500 pounds of donated computer equipment.

Southwestern Bell Telephone Company gave $250,000 worth of used equipment to the department, said Marcie Welch, Southwestern Bell's community relations manager in Manhattan.

Chander Bhalla, head of the physics department, said the equipment will be used by graduate students doing research on condensed matter and atomic physics.

"The equipment will be used primarily to train graduate students and undergraduate students that work in the research lab," Bhalla said.

Bhalla said the equipment is a perfect complement to his department's program, which is growing in size and national recognition.

The computer can be used to train the students in experimental research so they can take the data and automatically record it on the computer, he said.

The physics department has a 2-year-old VAX computer used for research and tabulations, but the new equipment will be used to automatically record research data, Bhalla said.

"Parts of the new equipment are being attached to our present computers which will increase the capacity and availability of the computer," said Basil Curnutte, associate department head.

"The computer is manufactured by the same company as our present departmental computer. Therefore, all the programs we have presently will work with this new addition," he said.

"The computer equipment is located in Cardwell Hall, and it should be ready for use in a couple of weeks," Bhalla said.

Welch said the Southwestern Bell equipment was previously used to provide information services like time and temperature recordings.

The system was also used by a stock brokerage in the Kansas City area for several years to provide up-to-date stock quotes, Welch said.

The stock brokerage went out of business, and Southwestern Bell officials, while looking for a new use for the equipment, found that laws prohibited the telephone company from using the equipment, Welch said.

Welch said a recent federal ruling forbids companies like Southwestern Bell from using the equipment to provide services like stock quotations and time and temperature readings.

"We made some effort to retrofit the equipment for our own internal uses, but it wasn't successful. That's why we're glad the students at K-State will be able to make use of the equipment," Welch said.

Industry officials say report on nuclear power inaccurate

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A watchdog group's contention that high numbers of nuclear plant mishaps made 1985 the worst year ever for nuclear safety is twisted and inaccurate, industry officials say.

Industry statistics "clearly show that reactor safety has been improving steadily since the Three Mile Island accident" in 1979, said Ed Davis, president of American Nuclear Energy Council, responding to a safety analysis released Thursday by the Ralph Nader-affiliated group Critical Mass.

"How many fatalities were there (in 1985)? Zero. How many catastrophic breakdowns? Zero. Injuries to the public? Zero. Injuries to workers? Zero. (Radiation) overexposures to workers? None for the second year in a row," said Don Winston of the Atomic Industrial Forum, another industry group.

"We keep reactors safe by reporting every deviation," he added. "We report them and they're public. And (the Critical Mass analysis) is making a travesty of this."

Critical Mass was founded 12 years ago by Nader and named for the amount of energy required to sustain a nuclear chain reaction.

Its "1984-85 Nuclear Power Safety Report," written by Joshua Gordon and dedicated to victims of the Soviet nuclear accident at Chernobyl, asserts that rising numbers of mishaps, emergency shutdowns and serious or "abnormal" occurrences indicate 1985 was an all-time low for nuclear safety.

Gordon criticizes the Nuclear Regulatory Commission as being too lax in enforcing its standards and inattentive to management problems that lie at the root of many safety lapses. But he concludes that even with improvements, nuclear power would have to be eliminated to completely protect the American public.

"The message from the operating experience of U.S. reactors in 1984 and 1985 is clear: the plants are unsafe and their safety record continues to worsen," Gordon wrote. "The likelihood and consequences of an accident, so dramatically demonstrated by the Chernobyl disaster, strongly argue for rapidly phasing out the nation's nuclear power program."

Among the statistics cited in the Gordon report:

—There were 10 serious accidents — "abnormal occurrences" ranging from high radiation exposures and loss of radioactive material to management problems affecting safety — in 1985, sustaining a trend that began in 1983.

—2,997 plant mishaps — "licensee events" ranging from minor to significant breakdowns in plant systems or procedures — were reported to the NRC in 1985, a 23 percent increase over 1984.

—There were 764 emergency shutdowns at U.S. plants in 1985, a 28 percent rise over 1984.

—Nine plants, accounting for 12 percent of the U.S. nuclear power generating capacity, were closed indefinitely in 1985.

But Davis cited a high number of plants shut down due to management problems, including all seven operated by the Tennessee Valley Authority, as evidence that the NRC is taking a strong stand on that issue.

He also said the higher number of licensee event reports indicates that "utilities are being much more careful in reporting everything to the commission and shows how careful and how thorough utilities are in identifying and analyzing operating data."

Officials blame shootings on drugs

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — A summer spate of shootings and the highest murder rate in the country have officials groping for ways to suppress firearms violence plaguing the nation's sixth-largest city.

Police records show that 266 people were shot in June, 42 of them fatally. During a single weekend there were 12 fatal shootings. In July, 307 people were shot and 51 died.

On Wednesday, the first day of school in Detroit, a 15-year-old ninth-grader was shot and critically wounded outside his high school, the victim of fellow students, according to police. Since June 1, more than a hundred people age 16 or younger have been shot in Detroit.

Community leaders blame the carnage on drugs and a sense of hopelessness among the city's young people. Ministers have called on Mayor Coleman Young to back a handgun ban, but Young and the City Council have balked.

"I don't think it's going to have any impact on crime at all to ask the people who are being shot at to give up their guns," Young said Wednesday in an interview with WJR Radio.

There are reasons for concern:

— On Sunday, a 7-year-old girl and her 3-year-old brother were seriously injured when bullets sprayed their house while they slept. Police believe the shooters thought someone in the home had alerted authorities that stolen cars were being dismantled in a nearby alley.

— The previous weekend, a 16-year-old girl was killed and a friend seriously wounded by three youths who allegedly "shot up" a chaperoned party they had been turned away from.

— Aug. 12, an 8-year-old girl visiting from Houston was killed and three other children were injured when gunfire strafed a home from a passing van. Police know of no motive.

— On the city's bloodiest weekend of the summer, June 27-29, 43 people were shot and 12 killed.

"You don't have to be doing nothing wrong," said 39-year-old Randall Stewart, one of that weekend's surviving victims. His right forearm was shattered by a bullet fired by a driver who nearly collided with Stewart's car.

"Just be in the wrong place at the wrong time and then, boom," he said in an interview with The Detroit News.

Taiwanese buy multi-million dollar Kansas wheat contract

File/Jim Dietz

Kansas farmers will see some of their wheat sent to Taiwan. A Taiwan trade delegation purchased about 3.1 million bushels of wheat, the most wheat bought anywhere by the Taiwanese, from Kansas during a buying session in the state senate chambers.

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Taiwan trade delegation purchased about 3.1 million bushels of wheat valued at $9.6 million Thursday during a buying session in the Kansas Senate chambers.

The 21-member delegation, which was seated at senators' desks, opened bids from American grain firms during the hour-long session. The latest purchase, as part of a special procurement tour of four grain-producing states, brought the value of grain purchased in Kansas during eight visits since 1978 to about $150.4 million.

The leader of the trade mission, K.H. Wu, said the most wheat the delegation has purchased on stops elsewhere this year in the United States is 60,000 metric tons, compared to the 85,000 metric tons the group bought Thursday.

"In other words, the greatest quantity of wheat we have purchased from your great country comes from the beautiful state of Kansas," Wu said during a news conference after contracts for delivery of the wheat were signed.

Eldon Fastrup, director of the marketing division of the state Department of Agriculture, said the Taiwanese specified they wanted to purchase U.S. No. 1 grade hard red winter wheat from Kansas.

"But it's hard to differentiate hard red winter wheat from Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska or elsewhere," Fastrup said. "But we produce a lot of hard red winter wheat and the more that moves out of this area has a positive impact."

Although the Taiwanese have purchased corn during previous buying sessions in Topeka, they accepted only bids for wheat this time, Fastrup said. Nine American grain companies participated in the bidding on nine different shipments of wheat to the east Asian island nation, he said.

Wu said the 85,000 metric tons the delegation purchased Thursday represented only a small portion of the country's annual wheat imports of about 670,000 metric tons. However, he said the purpose of the trade mission was to "show our eagerness to buy from you."

Tax reform to help farm industry

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

The farming industry "came out fairly well" in the current tax reform report, according to an official of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Grace Ellen Rice, associate director of the Washington, D.C., office of the AFBF, said tax reform provisions should simplify the code and provide equity, while eliminating some credits and deductions and providing a broader tax base. Rice was in Manhattan to address participants of the Kansas Farm Bureau Agriculture Media Conference Thursday at the Holidome.

She said the conference report, which faces Congress after return from the August recess, would contain two general tax brackets — 15 percent and 28 percent. But, she said, a less-publicized provision calls for an additional 5 percent surcharge at the top-end income levels.

Rice said corporate tax rates will "stay pretty much the same."

Self-employed individuals, who comprise a large segment of the agriculture industry, will only be allowed a 25 percent deduction for health insurance costs, for a three year period, ending Jan. 1, 1990.

In regard to capital gains, she said the bureau's preference was to keep status quo or have Congress adopt an indexing provision.

Rice said this would be the "reasonable and fair way to tackle this problem," but the committee refused to accept indexing. As a result, she said, capital gains are being dropped altogether, leaving them to be taxed at the regular rates.

She said this issue would mostly affect retiring farmers or those deciding to leave the industry.

Concerning the issue of investment tax credits, she said the bureau's position would be to support their repeal, although proposals call for a 35 percent discount for unused credits.

Rice said about $3 billion in accumulated tax credits are currently being held by farmers. She noted the legislation is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1986.

Also relatively unchanged are depreciation regulations, although cars and light trucks will be depreciated over five years instead of the current three, and single-use farm buildings for seven years instead of five.

She also said land-clearing projects toward long-term improvements must be capitalized, although regular maintenance clearing would not be affected.

Of special interest to farmers facing financial problems, she said, is a proposal that write-downs of farm debts, or debt restructuring resulting in reduced liability, would not be construed as taxable income.

Current law requires forgiven debts to be listed as income for taxation purposes.

Rice said she expects the committee report on tax reform to face both the Senate and House in mid-September. She noted that due to its status as a report, it is not open to amendment.

Agricultural crises may improve, state Farm Bureau president says

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

Despite the continued crises for many in the agriculture sector, some individuals are beginning to see a change in direction toward the positive.

Doyle Rahjes, president of the Kansas Farm Bureau, told participants in the KFB Agriculture Media Conference Thursday that many current problems were caused by "well-intended, but misguided farm policies undertaken the last 50 years."

But he also said recent visits to the state by agriculture representatives from other nations "tells me we must be headed in the right direction in our attempt to recapture our share of the world market."

During his opening statements at the conference at the Manhattan Holidome, Rahjes said the visiting representatives have been disappointed to learn that "American farm producers have a strong resolve to expand foreign grain sales." He said the U.S. share of world wheat exports dropped from 48 percent in 1981-1982 to a low of 24.7 percent last year.

Rahjes said the Food Security Act of 1985 will assist the United States in recouping some of that loss, with a projected increase of 6 percent for the current year. He said similar increases should occur in both the corn trade share and coarse grain exports.

He said subsidies and other shelters employed by other nations were largely responsible for losses in the U.S. shares, but added, "It is time U.S. competitors, trading on the world market, face up to the fact that the United States is going to compete in the world trade arena."

One positive move seen by Rahjes was a potential agreement for the long-term purchase of 4 million metric tons of wheat by the Soviet Union.

"All barriers to agricultural trade, including tariffs and import quotas, should be gradually eliminated, with no new barriers added of existing barriers expanded during the transition period," the KFB president said.

He also called for the gradual elimination of all farm export and import subsidies.

Rahjes said recent years have not been good for economic development in the state, and that many communities have failed to recruit other industries to help stabilize the economy.

Travis not shopping for new job

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

After two days of interviews with University of Florida officials concerning the unfilled athletic director position, Larry Travis said he is perfectly happy with his job as K-State athletic director.

"I have not applied for the job and I'm not going to do anything more than I've done," Travis said. "I'm not going to get on the phone and call people (about getting the job). I like it here. I feel like we finally got our program moving and I'm not looking forward to leaving."

Travis is one of five finalists for the Florida job being vacated by the retirement of Bill Carr. The Jacksonville Times-Union earlier this week reported that Travis was the leading candidate for the job, based upon the fact that he is the only candidate who is a Florida alumnus.

"I was thrilled they considered me qualified to run a program like this," Travis said. "Florida is one of the top five (athletic) programs in the country and for me to be considered for the job was a real honor to me and what we're doing here at Kansas State."

Travis did say the job is an opportunity he would have to look at carefully if an offer is made, but with the season-opening football game Saturday, the timing was not very good.

"If it is something that is good for you and your family on down the road, I think everyone has to look at (a job like) that," Travis said. "I enjoyed the visit. The timing isn't very good, but it was an interesting experience for me to go back and see what they have and what they've done, since I grew up in Florida and went to school there."

But Travis is adamant in stating he is not looking to leave K-State.

"The students have been wonderful — we need more support from them, but it will come. The Kansas State people are rallied and they're trying to help us. So I'm certainly not disenchanted at all. In fact, if anything, I'm more excited about what we're doing now more than ever," Travis said.

The search committee is expected to complete the interviewing process Sept. 10 and decide who will be offered the job between Travis and athletic directors David Wagner of Georgia Southern, Cedric Warren Dempsey of the University of Arizona, Fred Gruninger of Rutgers University and Richard Young of Washington State University.

"The offer hasn't been there — it may not ever be," Travis said. "That doesn't bother me. If it doesn't come, I'll just be pleased as pink because I'm not going to have to make the decision to do something.

"It's not going to make any difference, because I feel very good about what I'm doing here. If I wasn't, boy I tell ya, I'd be on the phone in a minute," Travis said.

Travis isn't going to waste any of his time worrying about what the outcome of the situation in Florida shall be, he's got too much to worry about here in Kansas.

"I'm not counting on anything down there. I've had my time in the sun and now I've got other things to do."

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis is perfectly happy with his job here and does not look forward to leaving. However, he considers that if University of Florida makes an offer it is something he will need to look at closely.

Opener matches throwing attacks

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Coach Stan Parrish doesn't mince words when he talks of the significance of K-State's Saturday night football season opener at KSU Stadium.

Following last year's 1-10 season, building confidence among Wildcat players is a top priority. If K-State can't manage at least a convincing victory over NCAA Division IAA Western Illinois, the hill representing the rest of the season will take an even more severe upgrade.

On the positive side, a win could do wonders for K-State players and fans alike.

"There may never be a bigger game for us emotionally," Parrish said. "We must get off to a good start."

For most Big Eight Conference teams, Western Illinois (5-5 in 1985), a member of the Gateway Conference, would mean an easy opener to help prepare for the remainder of the season. For K-State, which lost to IAA teams Northern Iowa and North Texas State the early part of last season, it's a different story.

"I think they (Western Illinois) come in here with full confidence they can win," Parrish said. "Other IAA teams have come in here and won in recent history, so I know they look on it as a great opportunity for them."

The two teams will enter the game with similar styles of play.

"I know they're a lot like we are in the fact that they want to throw the ball, and they have a good young quarterback (sophomore Paul Singer) and a very aggressive defense that will take chances," Parrish said. "It has all the makings of being a very exciting ballgame."

Singer, the starter in four Western Illinois victories in 1985, was the top freshman quarterback statistically in IAA last year with more than 1,600 yards in passing.

"He's got a nice attitude, but he's inexperienced," Western Illinois Coach Bruce Craddock said. "He's a good drop-back passer."

Craddock had plenty of good things to say about K-State, especially the Wildcat defense, which returns five starters.

"We know (Jeff) Hurd, (Kevin) Humphrey and (Tim) MacDonald (K-State's front three) and their linebackers and secondary are all excellent football players," he said.

Offensively, the Leathernecks are a passing team, with 2,298 yards passing last year.

"We like to throw the football," Craddock said. "We think we have some good receivers."

Western Illinois returns both starters at the wideout positions from last year, seniors Albert Brown and Nate Blanks. Both averaged more than 15 yards a catch last season.

The game will mark the public debut of the widely-publicized "Air Parrish" offensive attack for K-State. Randy Williams will be the starting quarterback for the Wildcats.

GAME NOTES: Gametime at KSU Stadium is 7 p.m. Saturday...Students going home for the Labor Day weekend can listen to the game in the Manhattan area on KMKF (101.7 FM) or WIBW (580 AM) as well as on KSU radio network stations across the state...K-State athletic department officials would like to remind fans attending the game that no containers will be allowed into the game...The game with K-State represents Western Illinois' only venture into the world of bigtime football this season. The Leathernecks' next opponent is Mankato (Minn.) State...Western Illinois will have a big size advantage over K-State across the front line. The heaviest starter on K-State's defensive front weighs 250 pounds while Western Illinois averages 263.8 pounds a man in the offensive line.

Writers choose OU to win

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Defending national champion Oklahoma is a near-unanimous choice to repeat as Big Eight Conference football champions, according to a poll of sportswriters and sportscasters.

The Big Eight said the Oklahoma Sooners were picked by 25 of the 27 reporters on the conference's Skywriters Tour that ended Wednesday. The two remaining ballots were cast for Nebraska.

Oklahoma finished with 214 total points in the poll, followed by Nebraska with 188, Colorado 155, Oklahoma State 138, Iowa State 100, Kansas 75, Missouri 69 and Kansas State 30.

The reporters projected Oklahoma quarterback Jamelle Holieway as the Big Eight Offensive Player of the Year.

Prosecutor's actions in Bias case questioned

By The Associated Press

The investigation into the death of Maryland basketball star Len Bias has stirred controversy over the prosecutor's conduct, while top University of Maryland officials are standing by basketball coach Lefty Driesell.

Attorneys for Brian Tribble, who has been indicted by a Prince Georges County grand jury, are asking that all charges against their client be dropped, claiming comments by State's Attorney Arthur Marshall Jr. have prejudiced the case against their client.

Attorneys Thomas Morrow and William Cahill Jr., in papers filed late Wednesday, charged Marshall "engaged in a consistent pattern of misconduct before the grand jury," by commenting publicly about evidence gathered against Tribble.

University Chancellor John Slaughter said he won't make a decision on Driesell's future until the grand jury presents its report next month. Athletic Director Dick Dull has released documents showing Driesell has advocated drug testing for his players for several years.

The grand jury last month indicted Tribble, 24, a former Maryland student and close friend of Bias, on charges of possessing and distributing cocaine. Marshall stated he believed Tribble supplied Bias with the cocaine that killed him.

The panel also indicted two of Bias' teammates, Terry Long and David Gregg, on drug possession charges and obstruction of justice for their suspected role in cleaning Bias' dormitory room of evidence that drugs were used.

Marshall said he had not reviewed the documents, but a change of venue would be a possibility if Tribble could not receive a fair trial in Prince Georges County.

"If I make Mr. Morrow unhappy with me, or if I make Mrs. Tribble call me evil, I guess I've done my job," Marshall said.

The investigation is "nothing more than a witchhunt, a fishing expedition," Williams said.

County Circuit Court Judge Vincent Femia, a longtime friend of Marshall, defended the prosecutor.

"It's got to be public," Femia said. "It involves a state institution — the University of Maryland.

"Marshall is rather deft at what he's doing — he's not releasing secret information; he's stating his conclusions about what the grand jury has heard. It sounds to me like he's frustrated."

Tribble's attorneys also attacked the conduct of county police, saying a statement that Tribble and Bias were seen in the company of drug dealers is "the rankest form of indictment by vague innuendo."

The attorneys said in the court papers that investigators have been "so abusive and coercive" toward potential witnesses in the Bias case that several witnesses have been reluctant to talk with attorneys representing defendants.

The Baltimore Sun said a county police detective and another unidentified person apparently tried to bribe a witness.

The newspaper reported Morrow said one of the men — not the detective — placed on a table before the witness a stack of $100 bills and told him to use the money to try to buy drugs from Tribble. Morrow said the witness was told he could keep the money if he would agree to help set up Tribble.

The grand jury has declined to indict Driesell, Marshall said Tuesday.

But, Slaughter said the lack of an indictment "doesn't change any of the issues before me at all."

Ticket sales begin to pick up for K-State, W. Illinois game

By The Collegian Staff

After a sluggish start, football ticket sales have picked up in the past couple of days as the unveiling of "Air Parrish" draws near, said Mike Jones, business manager of the athletic department.

"The ticket office is really swamped," Jones said. "If you walk by there (ticket office), there is always a line."

Jones is optimistic about the turnout for Saturday's season opener against Western Illinois at KSU Stadium.

"I'm expecting more than were here for last season's opener (22,000)," Jones said. He added that he did not think the crowd would exceed 25,000.

Jones said the ticket office has been so busy that ticket sales have not been tallied since Tuesday.

Jones said season ticket sales are on about the same pace as last year, suggesting that fans are taking a wait-and-see approach to the premiere of coach Stan Parrish.

Jones said future ticket sales hinge to a large degree on the outcome of the first game.

Parrish echoed the same sentiments, saying he expected a large walk-in crowd at Saturday's game. He said he believes the students want to see what the team can do before they commit themselves to buying season tickets.

Jones noted that tickets are selling the fastest for the Nebraska game in Lincoln and the Kansas game here.

"The KU game is going real well as far as tickets go," Jones said. "It looks like we'll sell out well ahead of the game."

Jones said season tickets will be available throughout the season, but of course will decline in value as the year progresses.

Troubled star shuns Georgia State to play basketball with Oklahoma

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Until Sunday, Georgia State University basketball coach Bob Reinhart thought junior college star Harvey Grant would enroll at Georgia State. Instead, Grant signed up for classes this week at the University of Oklahoma.

Grant, a 6-foot-10, 205-pound forward from Sparta, Ga., started his college career in 1984-85 at Clemson, where his twin brother, Horace Grant, is a starting center. Harvey Grant transferred to Independence Junior College in Kansas, where he averaged 22.8 points and 11.8 rebounds in 1985-86.

Grant signed scholarships with Kentucky and Nevada-Reno, but he said in June he would attend Georgia State. Later, Oklahoma announced he had signed with that school. Kentucky and Nevada-Reno released Grant from the scholarships he had signed with them.

He enrolled in classes at the Norman campus of the University of Oklahoma this week and was listed on the Sooners' list of basketball signees, according to Larry McAlister, assistant sports information director at Oklahoma.

Reinhart said he talked to Grant last Friday and Grant had agreed to come to Atlanta on Sunday.

"We've done all we could do," Reinhart said. "We don't have the tradition of a lot of schools, but he had said he wanted to come to Atlanta and play against his brother. That was in our favor. But I'm not going to twiddle my thumbs and worry."

Grant pleaded guilty earlier this month to the theft of $16,000 worth of musical equipment from the Independence campus. He received a suspended six-month jail sentence and two years' probation. His probation allows him to attend school out of state.

School costs up 5.2 percent

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — It will cost an average of $4,263 to educate each of the nearly 40 million children and teen-agers in the nation's public schools this fall, the government said Thursday.

The figure, a record, is up by $212 from last year, or 5.2 percent, and represents an 18.3 percent real increase, after inflation, in the public school bill since 1980-81. The sum includes school spending on construction, debts and other capital outlays.

The public schools spent an average of $2,762 per pupil in attendance in 1980-81.

Overall enrollment, counting pupils in all classrooms, public and private, from kindergarten to graduate school, will rise slightly to 57,422,000, or 89,000 more than last fall, according to the annual back-to-school forecast from the U.S. Department of Education's Center for Statistics.

The total school bill will climb to $278.8 billion, an increase of $15.4 billion or 5.8 percent. Consumer prices rose 1.6 percent in the 12 months ending July 31.

Secretary of Education William J. Bennett said in a news release, "Almost one out of every four Americans is in school. (They) are the reason for this nation's drive for education reform. They are the future, and the goal for them is excellence."

Many states have raised both their standards and their school budgets in recent years. Teacher salaries, which lagged behind inflation in the 1970s, have spurted ahead lately. They went up last year by 7 percent to $25,257, according to National Education Association figures.

Bennett's department predicted the average teacher will get a 5.5 percent pay raise this year to $26,650. Six years ago the average salary was $17,644.

But teacher salaries comprise less than half the total school costs, and their share has actually shrunk as many districts expanded central office staffs and hired specialists with no classroom duties. Bennett has questioned how effectively schools are spending that money.

Most private schools operate on lower budgets than public schools, in large part by paying teachers less and operating with fewer labs and other facilities. Private enrollment is expected to hold steady at 5.7 million.

The public schools are expected to gain 172,000 students, with the growth occuring in elementary schools due to a "baby blip" — an upward turn in the number of births in the United States that started in 1977. Public elementary enrollments will be up by 288,000 to 27.2 million, while high school enrollments will fall by 116,000 to 12.3 million.

Colleges are expected to enroll 12,164,000 students, a drop of 83,000, or less than 1 percent, from last year. Colleges will spend an average of $12,046 per full-time student — $10,462 on public campuses and $16,697 on private ones.

Pentagon accuses Lockheed of improper contract activity

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has accused the Lockheed Corp. of inflating its production contract for the C-5B cargo plane by as much as $500 million by improperly withholding financial information from the Air Force during contract negotiations.

The allegation was disclosed Thursday by the Air Force in a prepared statement. The service said it would now "initiate action...to obtain an appropriate price adjustment."

Lockheed denied the charges in a prepared statement Thursday, asserting there was "no merit to these allegations."

The allegation against Lockheed is based on provisions of the federal Truth-in-Negotiation Act and involves a complex area of law known as "defective pricing."

The Pentagon said Thursday it believes the dollar amount in dispute with Lockheed is the largest ever encountered in such a case.

The allegation against the Lockheed-Georgia Co., the subsidiary that builds the giant C-5 cargo plane, stems from a probe conducted by the Defense Contract Audit Agency in May. That audit, which has not been released publicly, has now been evaluated by the Air Force, and its basic findings accepted, the service said.

According to the Pentagon statement, the heart of the case revolves around Lockheed's alleged failure to share with Air Force procurement agents the company's bargaining goals and objectives prior to negotiating a new union agreement in 1983.

By withholding that information, the Air Force proceeded to negotiate a $7.8 billion contract in December 1982 for 50 C-5B aircraft, using earlier Lockheed estimates for its labor expenses, the statement said.

Lockheed subsequently emerged from the labor negotiations with "wage structure proposals (that) were far different and lower than the direct labor rates included in Lockheed's proposal for the C-5B," the Pentagon said.

The union contract that resulted from those negotiations for the first time allowed Lockheed to establish a two-tier wage system in which newly-hired workers were paid less than established workers doing the same job.

By law, the Pentagon statement continued, Lockheed should have disclosed its collective bargaining plans with the Air Force.

The Air Force said Thursday the defense audit agency had projected the defective pricing would total "between $400 million and $500 million" through completion of the program in fiscal 1989.

To date, however, contract options have been exercised for only 29 aircraft. The Air Force said it was not yet prepared to estimate how much money had actually been paid out as a result of defective pricing.

But the service added that it was prepared to seek refunds as well as adjustments to the final contract option for the last 29 planes.

Under the law, the statement added, the Air Force can "make a unilateral price adjustment if the contractor does not agree."

Such a unilateral reduction could subsequently be appealed by Lockheed to the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals or the U.S. Claims Court.

Lockheed was the nation's sixth largest defense contractor in fiscal 1985, the last year for which figures are available. It received Pentagon contracts valued at $5.1 billion that year.

Court overturns restitution ruling

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Inmates who escape from prison cannot be forced to pay restitution for the state's expense to hunt them down, the Kansas Court of Appeals said Thursday.

The ruling overturned a portion of a sentence Leavenworth County District Judge Frederick N. Stewart had issued for three inmates who escaped from the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing in September 1984.

The three inmates, Thaddeus Jones, John Allen Purdy and Thanh Van Pham, were among five prisoners who escaped but were apprehended two days afterward in different locations. The three had been serving life sentences for first-degree murder.

Jones, Purdy and Pham later pleaded guilty to charges of aggravated escape from custody and the judge ordered restitution of $5,136 each as a condition for their early release on the escape charges. Stewart arrived at the figure by taking the Department of Corrections' estimated cost of the manhunt, $25,680, and dividing it by five.

However, the appeals court opinion said the "bottom line" is whether the Legislature intended the state's restitution law to cover the costs of capturing escaped prisoners.

"If a private citizen is the victim of a crime, would the statute ... authorize a trial judge to order the defendant to pay the investigation expenses? We think not," the three-member panel said in its ruling.

"Likewise, it does not appear to be the intent of the Legislature that when the state of Kansas is the victim that investigative costs and costs of apprehension be assessed against the defendant."

The appeals court also said the law would have allowed the state to recover restitution for damage to property the prisoners may have caused in the escape attempt.

The ruling ordered Stewart to remove the portion of his sentence against the three prisoners that dealt with the restitution. The appeals judges also used the ruling to criticize the inmates' legal counsel at the time of sentencing for making only a "vague" objection to the restitution.

Apprehending the five inmates consumed 1,653 hours of corrections employees' time and amounted to a loss of $25,680 from the department's budget, according to a report prepared at the time of sentencing.

The prisoners contended in their appeal that it was not proper for them to be forced to reimburse the cost of the manhunt, and that since they have little money to pay the expense, that portion of the sentence was an "abuse of discretion" on the part of the judge.

The appeals court ruling said the five prisoners escaped at about 1 a.m. on Sept. 24, 1984 and separated into two groups. Jones was captured in Kansas City, Kan. at 6 p.m. on Sept. 26 and two other inmates who were not part of the appeal were apprehended shortly afterward in the same general area.

Purdy and Pham were captured six hours later as they walked along a highway about five miles south of the penitentiary, the ruling said.

China of today remains mysterious to scholars, politicians

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A decade after the passing of Mao Tse-tung, the enigma that is China remains largely a mystery to American scholars and State Department policy-makers.

Reading the same tea leaves, they come up with varying conclusions about the course of reform under Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping and what it portends for U.S. relations with the world's largest country.

Basically, these analysts agree China is a more open society. And yet, "it's still not a government of laws, rather than men," said Harold C. Hinton, political science professor at George Washington University.

"Mao's nuttiness, which developed after a serious illness in 1953, is all gone," Hinton said in a recent interview. "They've got rid of all of Mao's personal barnacles on the ship of state."

But the professor also discerned in the ministry of state security, set up by Mao's successors a few years ago, unpleasant reminders of the Soviet KGB secret police.

"If its name is mentioned," Hinton said, "people look back over their shoulder."

Ray Cline, a former deputy CIA director, said Americans were so impressed with China's recovery from the "pathological situation" under Mao they leap to the conclusion Peking will be a friendly power in Asia.

But, the onetime intelligence specialist said, "the Deng regime makes it absolutely clear they do not consider themselves in any way an ally of the United States."

China is equally critical of Washington and Moscow, as it seeks advantages from both sides, Cline said.

Mao's declining years were marked by purges, paranoia and anti-intellectualism. The country's economy faltered. China drew inward. Foreigners and their technology were viewed with deep suspicion.

This has changed in the 10 years since Mao's death on Sept. 9, 1976. Relations were established with the United States in 1979. American firms flocked to China, where they are received warmly.

But they must grapple with a bureaucracy that is long on red tape and short on decision-makers.

Joyce Kallgren, chairman of UCLA's Center for Chinese Studies, found in China enormous progress, particularly in the countryside. Production is up and the farmers no longer are called peasants.

They are freer to make decisions. And yet, Kallgren, who has visited China almost every year since 1974, saw little interest in democracy.

Interestingly, she found many Chinese yearning for the wares they now can see on television from Hong Kong and Japan. But, the University of California-Los Angeles scholar also detected a fear among some Chinese that in the rush to westernize, the country might lose its special character — a process called "spiritual pollution."

To a State Department official, who was willing to discuss post-Mao China only anonymously, "the major changes are a greater openness to the outside world and a willingness to tolerate differences at home and abroad."

For the average Chinese, he said, there is more individual flexibility — the official pointedly shied away from the word freedom — and "greater latitude for individual initiative."

China's stance toward the Soviet Union worries Cline.

"The Chinese Communists have been quite receptive to the intiative of Secretary General (Mikhail) Gorbachev to put differences aside and to cooperate in the Soviet effort to diminish American influence in the whole region of East Asia and the Western Pacific," he said.

Falcon Eddy exudes freestyle rock 'n' roll

By TAMA ERICKSON
Collegian Reporter

Four lead singers, one band. Four sounds, one band: Falcon Eddy.

Review

Falcon Eddy has been described as "The Midwest's most promising and upcoming group." It's good to find a band who is real. In conversation, one finds the members of Falcon Eddy easygoing, open individuals. They enjoy making not just music, but good music.

A danceable, listenable and definitely enjoyable band, Falcon Eddy doesn't require tight pants and sweat to sell an audience. Their enthusiastic, freestyle rock 'n' roll does the selling for them.

"We have no definition. We are a versatile band and we are here to play for people. People not only want to hear music, they want to smile," said Kurt Barkdull, percussionist.

"The band never fights; no one yells. That says a lot about a band," said Bruce Murphy, soundman.

Falcon Eddy is Kurt Barkdull, percussion; Joe Raven, key boards and sax; Danny J., bass guitar; and Gale Maag, guitar. The band's repertoire is about one-third original material and two-thirds Top 40.

The unwritten rule in the music industry dictates that a band has one lead singer. Falcon Eddy breaks that rule. Each of the four members appears as lead vocalist during a set. The move is nonconformist. The result is refreshing. Because each voice is surprisingly distinct some might argue that continuity is disrupted. But it works, and one can't argue with positive audience reaction.

The band has completed one album, "Falcon Eddy," released in 1985. The group would like to become more recognized before completing their next album. They are looking for a direction in which to take any future LPs.

After seeing the band live, it's safe to say the album doesn't do the band justice. Falcon Eddy has a quality sound and performance that wasn't captured on the LP.

The band keeps a busy schedule, playing 20 to 25 nights a month. Of all the places they perform, their favorite place is Mannequins in Aggieville.

"They treat you like a real band here, that means a lot," the group said.

If the band could say anything to the public, Danny J., bass guitar, said it all, "Just come once. We're not the average band."

Falcon Eddy will be playing at Mannequins from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. tonight and Saturday at Mannequins.

since the state's system is coupled with the federal system.

"There is a train rolling in Washington, D.C., and it's got tax reform written all over it," Docking said. "I never thought we'd see it, and it will have major tax results."

Docking went on to say he will support the reversal of any unlegislated tax increase handed down from federal tax reform.

The candidates were asked their feelings on the issue of mandatory crop control by the federal government.

"Farmers are the most independent people in the world," Hayden said. "The low turnout for the referendum of farmers on the issue indicates that farmers don't have lots of confidence in the federal government and the majority voted for mandatory controls. That's the only time (when mandatory controls were in place) when we've substantially reduced surpluses."

"The referendum passed," Docking said. "It asked if they favored mandatory crop control programs and the majority said yes. There is a widespread belief in the agriculture community that things are not working now.

"If we're going to market, then let's do it, let's market. If we're going to sell, let's do it, let's sell."

Both candidates feel the bonding of grain trading companies is vital to Kansas agriculture.

"It's a great risk to farm communities to put grain in an elevator and not know if it's protected. This (bonding) is too vital to the community not to have," Docking said.

"Everyone is getting gun-shy about liability risks," Hayden said. "Farmers should be assured about the safety of their grain. I am the one candidate who will speak out for tort reform."

residents, have both pre- and postnatal instruction and will offer programs for non-residents as well, she said.

After a baby is born, she said, an effort will be made to help the mother adjust to a single lifestyle and find a job or Social Rehabilitation Service assistance.

Area professionals, such as doctors, nurses and counselors, have also volunteered their services, she said.

The board of directors will be the decision-making body for Dream House, she said.

Gale also said he disagreed with recent Soviet conclusions that only an insignificant number of Chernobyl radiation victims could benefit from bone marrow transplants.

He said that in general, bone marrow transplants work in 25 percent of cases where radiation has destroyed victims' bone marrow.

"The point is, we can save more lives by doing the operation than not doing it," he said.

Meanwhile, a working group at the weeklong IAEA conference continued Thursday to assess the Chernobyl reactor's design and safety features.

A Soviet atomic expert said Wednesday that another nuclear disaster like the one at Chernobyl could not occur in the Soviet Union because of modifications made to that kind of reactor since the accident.

Armen A. Abagyan of the Soviet Ministry of Energy and Electrification and head of the ministry's Nuclear Power Station Institute, also told reporters that the experiment that caused the accident had been performed there safely two years earlier.

Campus probe results in state investigation

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

After a review by the Riley County attorney, the results of an ongoing campus investigation will be sent to the Kansas attorney general for further evaluation, Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police, said Sunday.

The investigation involved the alleged misuse of surplus government equipment within the Department of Forestry.

Beckom said after the results were reviewed by Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy, it was decided the report should be evaluated further by the attorney general.

"The investigation is by no means complete," Beckom said, "but we are at the point now where we feel there is sufficient specific evidence being developed to warrant the involvement of the Attorney General's office."

The equipment involved in the complaint is used to assist rural fire districts throughout the state. Because the forestry department serves as the state forestry agency and extension department, it issues the government-surplus equipment to the districts and takes the equipment back when it is no longer needed.

The forestry department has 329 cooperative agreements with more than 500 separate fire protection districts.

According to an Aug. 30 press release from the Office of University Relations, Jay Schultz, head of the forestry department and state forester, became suspicious during a routine program review that equipment obtained from the federal government was not being delivered to the fire districts. He called for the investigation.

The release said University officials now believe the scheme was designed to illegally divert for private use large amounts of federal surplus vehicles and equipment intended for rural fire districts.

Schultz confirmed in July that the investigation has led to the resignation of a member of the forestry department.

He refused to name the person or tell what type of position the individual occupied.

Cy Wainscott, managing editor for University Relations, said the resignation probably came about because "the person who resigned was responsible for the area requiring federal funds and also the administrative program."

Beckom confirmed Sunday that no charges have been filed in the investigation.

Attorney General Robert Stephan has been aware of the investigation since it was initiated in June, Beckom said.

The investigation began on June 10 as an ongoing administrative project review of the forestry department. The department then filed an official complaint with campus police.

Authorities from the campus police have been working in conjunction with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in the forestry department investigation.

University officials said campus police have turned over more than 300 pages of investigation documentation to the KBI. The material, along with material KBI has been collecting, is being given to the Kansas attorney general.

Beckom said the material represents nearly 400 hours of investigation and hundreds of miles in travel.

In July, Wainscott was quoted as saying, "There is something positive that can be seen in all this. The system of checks and balances in the University works. Schultz himself was able to spot that something was wrong in the department and started the investigation process.

"From my point of view this fact is very encouraging," Wainscott said.

V-ball team toils for top-20 rank

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson brings his team into the 1986 season hoping to improve upon last year's third-place finish in the Big Eight.

Four of six starters and eight players altogether return from last year's team which went 21-11.

While the team will have considerable talent, the Lady Cats will miss the experience and leadership of Donna Lee and Renee Whitney, both seniors and First-Team All Big Eight selections last year.

"We're young; there's no doubt about that," said Nelson of the roster which lists only two seniors. The roster also includes five juniors, three sophomores and five freshman.

Nelson said he sees Nebraska and Oklahoma, which finished first and second, respectively, last year as the teams to beat again this season.

He said while he would consider Nebraska the "heavy favorite," he expects the second- through sixth-place spots to be a "real dogfight" this year.

Nelson said he plans to utilize the team's strength — its size — to its advantage.

"What we'll try to do is play to our strength," Nelson said. "We'll be a fairly strong defensive and blocking team because of our size."

"We want to have the game determined at the net," he added.

Nelson said the team should be strong in the middle again with the return of senior Helen Bundy who led the conference in blocking last year.

The Lady Cats' coach is also looking to the outside hitting duo of junior Mary Kinsey and sophomore Shawnee Call to make a large contribution to the team's success. Both participated in the United States Olympic Festival this summer in Houston, and the experience is expected to have benefited both. Kinsey has also been named captain of this year's squad.

Nelson's main concern right now is finding someone to fill the hole left at the setting position by the departure of Renee Whitney. She was a three-year starter at the position and was in charge of running the offense, Nelson said.

Nelson said several "real talented" players vying for the position, but the final decision has yet to be made.

Nelson, who enters his seventh year as head volleyball coach at K-State, called last year's recruiting class the best in his tenure here.

With seven new players currently on the roster, Nelson said he expects more intense competition for each spot on the roster than was seen in previous seasons.

Nelson placed a great deal of emphasis on getting off to a fast start. Nelson said he believes if the team does well early on, it has "Top 20 potential."

Nelson said it is important for the team to start well because winning "snowballs on itself when you win."

He envisions the team as finally reaching a plateau for which he has been striving.

"We've been building to become competitive. Now we are solidly competitive," Nelson said.

Nelson expects a tough early season schedule to prepare his team for the rigors of the Big Eight season. K-State opens the season at home, hosting the Pepsi/KSU Invitational on Sept. 5-6.

Authorities from the campus police have been working in conjunction with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in the forestry department investigation.

University officials said campus police have turned over more than 300 pages of investigation documentation to the KBI. The material, along with material KBI has been collecting, is being given to the Kansas attorney general.

Beckom said the material represents nearly 400 hours of investigation and hundreds of miles in travel.

In July, Wainscott was quoted as saying, "There is something positive that can be seen in all this. The system of checks and balances in the University works. Schultz himself was able to spot that something was wrong in the department and started the investigation process.

"From my point of view this fact is very encouraging," Wainscott said.

K-State's harriers face a season of questions

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Call this the "Year of the Question Mark" for the K-State men's cross country team.

First-year head coach John Capriotti takes over a team that on one hand finished third in the Big Eight Conference last year, and on the other hand lost three of its top five runners from that team.

Gone is team leader in Bryan Carroll along with Bryon Lopez and Mike Rogers. How they are replaced, Capriotti said, will depend on how well the Wildcats fare in his inaugural season.

"This team right now is a big question mark," Capriotti said. "We have four freshman we will be counting on heavily. They are very tough but young."

Among the group of "tough" freshman are Swedish import Jan Jonsson, David Keller, David Warders and Matt Vavala.

An instrumental part of the outcome of this season depends on the way these runners adhere to the stipulations of race conditions.

"I have to try to convince the freshman they can do it," Capriotti said. "Age should not be an excuse. I am going to try to convince them they are not freshman."

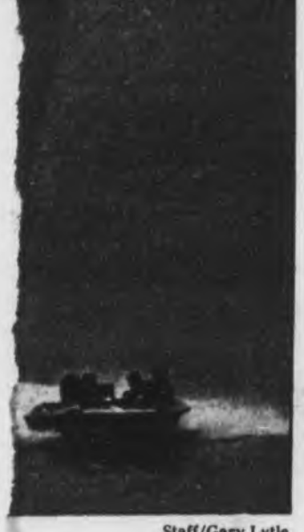
One person Capriotti will not have to convince he is a Big Eight-caliber runner is Ron Stahl. Stahl was a driving force for the team after injuries wreaked havoc with the squad late last season.

"Ron Stahl is without question our top runner," Capriotti said. "He is head and shoulders above the rest of the team and has provided sound leadership."

Capriotti is also counting on sophomore tandem Rob Hayes and Pat Hessini to help alleviate the distance between his young freshmen and talented upperclassmen.

"Hessini and Hayes are not even the same runners as last year. They are way out ahead of what they did last year," he said.

Like the women's team, Capriotti plans to race some of the younger members of the squad in early meets and save his best runners for later in the season to avoid injuries that have plagued the team in the past.



The team will host the KSU Open on Sept. 27 with the men and women both competing. The meet, at Warner Park, will feature the nation's top men's cross country squad when Arkansas pays a visit to Manhattan. They will also be hosting the Big Eight Championships Nov. 1 at Warner Park.

Those two meets, along with the Wisconsin Burger King Invitational, are the only non-post-season races toward which Capriotti is gearing his top squad, he said.

Capriotti said he hopes by the time the District 5 and the National Collegiate Athletic Association National Championships come around, his young squad will have matured into top-division contenders.

"Our goal is an upper-division finish," Capriotti said. "We could be higher if the freshmen come along. I will be disappointed with anything lower."

If Capriotti's hopes gel into reality, he might be able to look back and coin this the "Year of the Exclamation Point."

Campus probe results in state investigation

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

After a review by the Riley County attorney, the results of an ongoing campus investigation will be sent to the Kansas attorney general for further evaluation, Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police, said Sunday.

The investigation involved the alleged misuse of surplus government equipment within the Department of Forestry.

Beckom said after the results were reviewed by Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy, it was decided the report should be evaluated further by the attorney general.

"The investigation is by no means complete," Beckom said, "but we are at the point now where we feel there is sufficient specific evidence being developed to warrant the involvement of the Attorney General's office."

The equipment involved in the complaint is used to assist rural fire districts throughout the state. Because the forestry department serves as the state forestry agency and extension department, it issues the government-surplus equipment to the districts and takes the equipment back when it is no longer needed.

The forestry department has 329 cooperative agreements with more than 500 separate fire protection districts.

According to an Aug. 30 press release from the Office of University Relations, Jay Schultz, head of the forestry department and state forester, became suspicious during a routine program review that equipment obtained from the federal government was not being delivered to the fire districts. He called for the investigation.

The release said University officials now believe the scheme was designed to illegally divert for private use large amounts of federal surplus vehicles and equipment intended for rural fire districts.

Schultz confirmed in July that the investigation has led to the resignation of a member of the forestry department.

He refused to name the person or tell what type of position the individual occupied.

Cy Wainscott, managing editor for University Relations, said the resignation probably came about because "the person who resigned was responsible for the area requiring federal funds and also the administrative program."

Beckom confirmed Sunday that no charges have been filed in the investigation.

Attorney General Robert Stephan has been aware of the investigation since it was initiated in June, Beckom said.

The investigation began on June 10 as an ongoing administrative project review of the forestry department. The department then filed an official complaint with campus police.

Authorities from the campus police have been working in conjunction with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in the forestry department investigation.

University officials said campus police have turned over more than 300 pages of investigation documentation to the KBI. The material, along with material KBI has been collecting, is being given to the Kansas attorney general.

Harriers striving for national title

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

John Capriotti believes it is about time K-State wins a Big Eight title, and he said there is no time better to start than this fall with his nationally acclaimed women's cross country team.

Capriotti, who took the impressive coaching reigns from now associate athletic director Steve Miller on July 1, inherits a women's program that has come off back-to-back national top-10 finishes.

But Capriotti, noted for his outstanding recruiting prowess, didn't sit back and wait for this year's schedule to roll around. The former Northwestern University cross country coach and long-time assistant to Miller, went out and signed some of the top talent from Kansas and overseas as well to complement a squad which returns everyone from last season.

"We should challenge for the Big Eight Championship (with Nebraska and Iowa State) and be one of the top five or six teams in the country," Capriotti said.

The key to the season, however, may fall again on the legs of returning All-American Jacque Struckhoff.

Struckhoff suffered a season-ending stress fracture to the neck of her femur bone during last year's outdoor track campaign and consequently missed the national meet. How quickly she responds and stays away from injury could determine the Wildcats' fate this season.

"We are a good team now," Capriotti said. "With a girl like Jacque Struckhoff we could be outstanding — one of the top three teams in the country. If she continues the progress she has made she will be OK."

Capriotti said the team will still be a national contender even if Struckhoff and Anne Stadler, who has an irritated knee, do not recuperate fully.

Betsy Silzer, who placed 37th in the NCAA nationals in 1984 and was redshirted last year with an injury, has returned and Capriotti said she is taking up right where she left off. Also, Anneli Edling, a freshman recruit from Sweden, has demonstrated she belongs with the leaders at the front of the Wildcat pack in only a few days of training.

"If Jacque doesn't return," Capriotti said, "we will still be good. She is such a great athlete, you never want to lose one of them. Edling is running just as good as Jacque...but Chris Vanatta is probably better and Betsy Silzer is just as good (as Struckhoff)."

In addition, Capriotti is counting on Alysun Deckert, Angie Barry and Lisa Wakem to add depth to the squad, a luxury last year's team couldn't enjoy with only five runners all season.

Injuries have taken their toll on K-State runners in past seasons and Capriotti said he believes he knows how to combat the situation.

"We are bringing them along more slowly," he said. "We are only going to race (the first team) in four or five quality races. We didn't have that luxury last year.

"We are working on more flexibility. I don't like them to do too much without my supervision."

If all of Capriotti's chips — or better yet injuries — fall in the right place, he may well be on his way to delivering K-State a long-awaited championship.

Women netters bolstered by top recruiting season

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

After the men's tennis program was dropped following the conclusion of last season, Steve Bietau was able to spend his undivided time rebuilding the women's tennis fortunes at K-State.

Bietau, who enters his third year at the helm of the Wildcat tennis program, controls a team that finished last in the Big Eight Championships a year ago, but made marked strides in moving up in the ever-tough conference race.

Upon coming to K-State from Hutchinson Community College where he took his Blue Dragon tennis team to a 13th place junior college national finish, Bietau quickly found K-State didn't have the caliber of players it takes to compete at the Division I level.

Bietau has made numerous strides in out-of-state recruiting by landing some top talent from Florida and Sweden. This year was no exception as he inked Valerie Rive', a transfer from Florida State and Lena Nurmi, from Palm Beach Junior College. Nurmi, however, will not join the team until the second semester.

In addition, Nancy Ramirez, Kim Parker and Debbie Hutchins will join last year's returnees Lena Svensson, Annika Emtell, Kristy Line and Tara White.

The team is using the fall season to tune up for the Big Eight season and the spring campaign.

"It is a teaching season for us," Bietau said. "It's a time we make changes in strokes and techniques, if needed, and grain them into their game."

The fall season also helps establish the pecking order for the spring, as challenge matches are set up to determine individual playing numbers.

"It is a little early to say now, but Lena Svensson, Valerie Rive', Annika Emtell and Kristy Line will be the top four in no particular order," Bietau said.

Rive', whose father is coach at Palm Beach Junior College where Svensson played junior college tennis before coming to K-State, will be the top freshman to ever play in a Wildcat uniform, Bietau said.

"She is in a class with Lena Svensson. She might not be as strong, but she is four years younger," he said.

Bietau said he believes the new additions will greatly enhance the women's fortunes this coming season.

Stan Parrish has made a career of... HARD LABOR

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

If Stan Parrish ever decides to make a carreer change, he may want to look into the construction business as one of his options.

Some might say the first-year K-State football coach has been in the construction — or reconstruction — business for many years.

Parrish brings to K-State a 55-11-2 mark from his seven years of college coaching at Wabash (Ind.) College and Marshall Univ. in Huntington, W. Va. His last two years at Marshall were the first winning seasons in more than 20 years for the college.

So Parrish is familar with building winning programs and he is the first to admit his hands are full at K-State.

"Almost everybody I know advised me against taking this job. It was the same advice I had on my last job. I'm not afraid of failing and I think that's the kind of guy you need on a job like this. The bottom line was that the one person's opinion that I valued the most that said, 'Take the job,'...was mine," Parrish said.

What finally influenced Parrish into undertaking a task some said could be accomplished only by a man who could walk on water was that he became convinced if there was a time for K-State to turn things around, it was now.

"We have a commitment here from our administration, our new president and our new athletic director. Nobody could have it better than I have it here right now. They want to win and they want to give me the tools to get the job done and I think that's important," Parrish said.

With the cooperation of his superiors, it is now Parrish's responsibility to put the wins in the record book. During that process, Parrish does his best to leave the word "rebuilding" out of his vocabulary, but that gets difficult when you're the newest coach for a program which has posted only two winning seasons in the last 31 years.

The situation at K-State reminds Parrish of the reconstruction job he went through at Marshall. In fact, when he wakes up it takes a glimpse out the window to remember whether or not he is in Kansas or back at Marshall.

"Every morning when I get up it's a different place, but the same problems. I think anywhere where there's been a prolonged period of not being successful, most of the problems are inherent in that program," Parrish said.

Parrish has made no secret of what will be the hammer and nails which will help him build a winner at K-State — a potent passing attack.

"I think K-State has been a beaten horse and that will be tough to overcome. Our plan is the same as it was when we got here. It wasn't lip service; we're going to throw the football," Parrish said.

"I became intrigued with the forward pass and I've also inherited a couple of jobs where I couldn't line up with two tight ends and three backs. Throwing the ball is an equalizer. I also think it's exciting for the fans, particularly when the team has not been a passing team in the past. I'm not quite sure I would be sitting here if I was an option expert," Parrish said.

Staff/Andy Nelson

First-year Head Coach Stan Parrish has made a career of taking programs with losing traditions and turning them into winners.

If nothing else, Parrish knows his passing game will be more entertaining for the fans than past offensive schemes he used early in his coaching days.

"I changed my coaching philosophy towards the end of my high school coaching career and started to throw the ball more. It wasn't any fun to run, run, run and punt. At least here we'll pass, pass, pass and punt," Parrish said. "Games will last longer and the party life will be cut into a bit, but those are the real tragedies that go along with throwing the football."

Parrish will have to win this season with basically the same players that managed to notch only one victory last season, but he realizes his future recruiting classes are the key to his success or failure as the Wildcat coach.

"I need bigger, faster players. That's the No. 1 fundamental thing I need to change. You can get those if you recruit hard. We're in an area that's heavily recruited without great population bases, so I think we have to recruit on a national level to be competitive. We at this time can not draw the No. 1 kid, so we have to a lot of the good No. 2's in our program and take a step up the ladder," Parrish said.

His players will not be the excuse, though, if Parrish fails to win in his first season. That would be the easy way out and Parrish knew what he was getting into when he came to K-State.

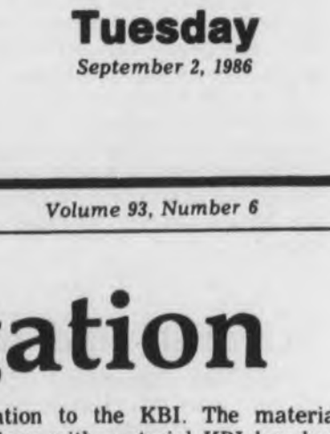
"I don't want to cry poor with my players. Because the people in this town and at this University don't want the excuse that we don't have any players and they're not going to get any excuses from me," Parrish said.

"We are not deep. I think our No. 1 group on either side of the ball will be a representative football team. Our goal is to win the football games we have a chance to win. I think that's a realistic goal. We're on the very bottom of the pack and we have to walk before we can run. We have to move up a few notches. I think we can win," Parrish said.

He is prepared to deal with the players he has, and Parrish knows when players are accustomed to playing for a losing program, the hardest thing to defeat is the losing attitude they have nurtured.

"The biggest thing I have to overcome is preaching and preaching and making them work hard and believe they can win," Parrish said.

Parrish, the businessman, knows it's just as vital for a "winning" program to have fans in the stands for the game as anything else. After all, that's where the money to recruit comes from.



And in his quest to fill up the stadium, Parrish is pulling a few pages out of one of his predecessors' game books. When Vince Gibson coached at K-State from 1967-74, he was known for taking his enthusiasm directly to the student body.

"I'm going to be somewhere on the campus. If I'm not on the radio, I'm going to be there live. I'm going to beg and plead for them to come out one time and have a good time and watch us play. Hopefully they'll have a good time," Parrish said.

But all of the blueprints Parrish the builder can make could be ruined if K-State would not walk away Saturday with a win. Parrish knows and is planning to do everything he can to finish with a victory.

"That's the biggest game we're going to play all year. This program and this community need a win. We haven't won a home game in two years. There may never be a bigger game for us emotionally. We must get off to a good start. It will give our program a lot of credibility with our players," Parrish said.

"I think we have some realistic goals. I think we're moving in the right direction and we have to win on Aug. 30 — period."

'Air Parrish' set to take off

New coach optimistic about gridiron season

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Stan Parrish enters his first season as K-State head football coach full of optimism, but tempers that outlook with a sense of realism.

The goals for the team are high, at least by K-State standards. In this, the first year of the Parrish era at KSU Stadium, the new coach's primary objective is to establish a winning philosophy on the team.

"The attitude is very good. They think they have a chance," Parrish said. "We're obviously not going to win any national championships this year. We're obviously not going to win the Big Eight either, because I happen to think we have the national champion (Oklahoma) in our league."

Parrish has made one thing clear though. K-State will be a passing football team. Parrish told the media at the news conference that accompanied his hiring last December that he intends to "start throwing the ball getting off the bus at the stadium."

Having had a chance to assess the talent he inherited from his predecessor Jim Dickey and also having brought in some recruits, Parrish says he still intends to carry out the plan.

"I think we've got a good approach, a good attack, and we can take what they give us. We'll spread them all over the field and go from there. I think the kids are excited about it," Parrish said.

Parrish believes the Wildcats will put a respectable team on the field, but shies away from making promises of immediate success.

Success in the non-conference portion of the schedule will be essential if the Wildcats are to have any success in the traditionally strong Big Eight Conference. After Saturday night's opener against Western Illinois, K-State travels to Texas Tech next week, hosts Northern Iowa Sept. 13 and plays Sept. 20 at Texas Christian.

"We must get off to a good start. It will give our program a lot of credibility with our players," Parrish said. "It's a competitive non-conference schedule, but one where we have a chance to be competitive each and every one of those weeks."

K-State has a week off before traveling to Norman to meet defending national champion Oklahoma, which returns a number of starters from last season including all-American linebacker Brian Bosworth and quarterback Jamielle Holloway.

Particular emphasis will be put on the Oct. 4 meeting with the University of Kansas in KSU Stadium.

"It's crucial to our program that we establish a sense of confidence and competition with our in-state rival," Parrish said.

The remainder of the Big Eight slate includes home games with Missouri, Oklahoma State and Colorado and road games against Nebraska and Iowa State.

The following is a position by position breakdown of the Wildcats.

Quarterbacks: Randy Williams will be the starting quarterback. Williams earned the spot in spring practice and appears to have solidified his hold in preseason drills.

"He's thrown the ball extremely well in practice," Parrish said. "I've dealt with a lot of good quarterbacks in my time and Randy has the tools to do it."

Williams will be backed up by senior John Welch, who directed the 'Cats to their only victory of last season over Missouri; and junior college transfer Tim Hanson.

Running Backs: Parrish plans to rotate four players at these positions. Tony Jordan and Todd Moody will be the tailbacks while Maurice Henry and Ray Wilson will share duty at fullback.

Big improvement is expected from Jordan.

"Tony Jordan is a guy that everyone has said has all the tools," Parrish said. "I hope (after Saturday's game), it won't be 'has the tools;' it will be 'ready to play.'"

Tim McDonald makes a key switch to noseguard from linebacker.

Staff/Jeff Tuttle

K-State defensive tackle Kevin Humphrey was named as the 1985 Big Eight Conference newcomer of the year.

Receivers: With the addition of junior college players Todd Cowings and John Williams and freshman Eric Blades, Parrish calls the receiving corps "the strength of our football team."

The transfers will join returnees Todd Elder, Dan Hughes and Mark Wentzel, all of whom are expected to get playing time. Kent Dean and Randall Godinet will alternate at tight end.

Offensive Line: If Air Parrish is ever to get off the ground, a smallish offensive line will have to become a group of overachievers.

"We're very small up front. We'll have to be a very cohesive, hard working group. We're also thin from a depth standpoint," Parrish said.

Three-time letterman Bob Bessert returns to anchor the line from his guard position. Dana Dimel and Rockey Dvorak are back at the tackle spots. Junior Matt Garver is expected to be the other starter at guard. Senior Gary Harshberger is now listed as the starting center after sophomore Rob Goode injured his back during this fall's drills and is expected to be out for six weeks.

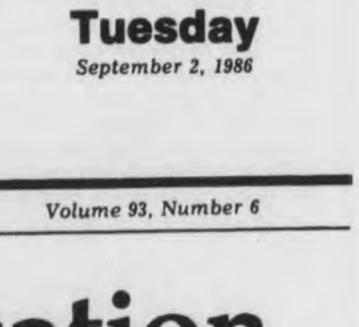
Defensive Line: The return of Kevin Humphrey, who left the team with three weeks remaining in spring drills, bolsters the line. Humphrey, who moves to tackle after winning conference Newcomer of the Year at end last season, will be joined up front by converted linebacker Tim MacDonald at nose guard and fifth-year senior Jeff Hurd at the other tackle.

"We're not big, so we'll have to be a team that relies on movement," Parrish said.

Linebackers: Lettermen Grady Newton and Dwayne Castille return at the outside spots. David Wallace, who Parrish termed "the standout of the group" and Dewayne Baziel are set to start at the inside positions. Matt Wallerstedt will see plenty of action backing up both Wallace and Baziel.

Defensive Backs: The secondary will sorely miss the talents of departed All-Big Eight free safety Barton Hundley, a draft selection of the Chicago Bears.

Returning to his starting cornerback position will be Brad Lambert, who was second on the team in tackles last season. Craig Chrislieb will man the other cornerback spot. Junior college transfer Willie Halliburton will start at strong safety while Robert Easterwood will play free safety.



Kicking game: Punter Troy Faunce and place kicker Mark Porter both return. Both players were solid in action last season.

"The kicking game should be a big plus for us," Parrish said. "We're going to have good kicking and that's obviously an area we're going to have to be good in."

The key to offensive success for the Wildcats rests on the arm of starting quarterback Randy Williams.

Campus probe results in state investigation

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

After a review by the Riley County attorney, the results of an ongoing campus investigation will be sent to the Kansas attorney general for further evaluation, Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police, said Sunday.

The investigation involved the alleged misuse of surplus government equipment within the Department of Forestry.

Beckom said after the results were reviewed by Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy, it was decided the report should be evaluated further by the attorney general.

"The investigation is by no means complete," Beckom said, "but we are at the point now where we feel there is sufficient specific evidence being developed to warrant the involvement of the Attorney General's office."

The equipment involved in the complaint is used to assist rural fire districts throughout the state. Because the forestry department serves as the state forestry agency and extension department, it issues the government-surplus equipment to the districts and takes the equipment back when it is no longer needed.

The forestry department has 329 cooperative agreements with more than 500 separate fire protection districts.

According to an Aug. 30 press release from the Office of University Relations, Jay Schultz, head of the forestry department and state forester, became suspicious during a routine program review that equipment obtained from the federal government was not being delivered to the fire districts. He called for the investigation.

The release said University officials now believe the scheme was designed to illegally divert for private use large amounts of federal surplus vehicles and equipment intended for rural fire districts.

Schultz confirmed in July that the investigation has led to the resignation of a member of the forestry department.

He refused to name the person or tell what type of position the individual occupied.

Cy Wainscott, managing editor for University Relations, said the resignation probably came about because "the person who resigned was responsible for the area requiring federal funds and also the administrative program."

Beckom confirmed Sunday that no charges have been filed in the investigation.

Attorney General Robert Stephan has been aware of the investigation since it was initiated in June, Beckom said.

The investigation began on June 10 as an ongoing administrative project review of the forestry department. The department then filed an official complaint with campus police.

Authorities from the campus police have been working in conjunction with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in the forestry department investigation.

University officials said campus police have turned over more than 300 pages of investigation documentation to the KBI. The material, along with material KBI has been collecting, is being given to the Kansas attorney general.

Beckom said the material represents nearly 400 hours of investigation and hundreds of miles in travel.

In July, Wainscott was quoted as saying, "There is something positive that can be seen in all this. The system of checks and balances in the University works. Schultz himself was able to spot that something was wrong in the department and started the investigation process.

"From my point of view this fact is very encouraging," Wainscott said.

Coaches' theories found under the letter 'P'

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Both offensive and defensive coordinators under first-year head coach Stan Parrish base their coaching philosophy on words that begin with "P."

One believes in pressure.

The other thrives on passing.

After the spring drills, Parrish said the Wildcats had to fine tune the offensive and defensive systems in order to achieve success in 1986.

The men in charge of that task are two assistant coaches in their first full year at K-State — offensive coordinator Ken Bowman and defensive coordinator Jerry Hartman.

Bowman followed Parrish from Marshall University in Huntington, W. Va., and Hartman comes to Manhattan via the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Defensive coordinator Jerry Hartman, left, and offensive coordinator Ken Bowman have been implementing their respective philosophies of pressure and passing.

Jerry Hartman

Hartman, with 17 years coaching experience, says pressure is the key to defensive success.

"We've worked real hard instilling a pride in our players to run to the football. You can eliminate the big plays with basically hustle, effort and running to or pursuing the football," Hartman said.

Under Hartman's philosophies, pressure caused by pursuit of the pigskin should lead to defensive highlights — interceptions, quarterback sacks and fumbles.

"You've got to create the big plays on defense; they simply just don't happen on their own. One of the ways you accomplish it is pressure. It's a simple philosophy," said Hartman, who comes to K-State after three years as defensive coordinator for the Navy.

Hartman, who also coaches defensive backs, has set other goals beside pressuring the football — obtaining good field position for the offense and eliminating mental errors are also priorities of the defensive coordinator.

"Those goals encompass a wide variety of areas, but the end result is what is most important," Hartman said.

And that end result is shutting down offenses — something K-State couldn't do in the Big Eight last year. The numbers proved that fact. The 'Cats were last in opponent rushing, and sixth in scoring and total defense last year in the conference.

But, Hartman said a team can't be judged by its statistics.

"Stats are misleading. If you play a Top 10 team and they rack up multiple passing yards on you, but you still won the game, then that final stat was the most important — who won or lost," said Hartman, who lettered three seasons as a defensive back at Michigan.

Ken Bowman

Air Parrish is set for takeoff Saturday, and the man in the control tower is Bowman.

Bowman has guided some decent pilots in his prior coaching experience. His proteges include current Houston Oiler starter and former Canadian Football League star Warren Moon, and 1981 Princeton star Bob Holly.

Moon, while having trouble adjusting to the NFL, was outstanding in Canada with the Edmonton Eskimos. Moon passed for more than 4,000 yards in 1983, and that season the team was first in scoring, touchdowns and total offense.

Holly set 20 Princeton passing records at the Ivy League school, and threw for 1,369 yards in a three-week period during the 1981 season including a 501-yard effort in a 35-31 defeat of Yale. That was only the 15th time in NCAA Division 1A history that a quarterback has passed for more than 500 yards in a game.

The secret behind a great quarterback, in Bowman's mind, is giving him a feeling of confidence.

"If you can prove to the quarterback that you have an offensive line with the ability to protect him, then he becomes confident," Bowman said.

"A quarterback can't feel confident if the defense hangs all over him everytime he goes back to pass."

Despite the fact that Bowman spent a year in the pass-happy CFL, Bowman said Wildcat fans should not expect that type of passing offense at K-State.

"The pass is much more in evidence in Canada," Bowman said. "The important thing here is that we have to operate under a possession-type scheme. In Canada it is easier to throw the ball because the field is longer and wider."

Oklahoma aims for triple-double

By The Associated Press

The triple-double, which in basketball means reaching double figures in points, rebounds and assists, has come to college football.

And that's what defending national champion Oklahoma will be shooting for as it attempts to become the first team in history to capture consecutive national titles for the third time.

The Sooners did it in 1955-56 and 1974-75. The only other double winner is Alabama (1964-65, 1978-79).

Oklahoma returns 18 starters, including 10 of 11 from an offense that scored nearly 31 points per game. The Sooners led the nation in total defense and pass defense and was second against the rush. Three members of that unit are gone, including All-American nose guard Tony Casillas, the Lombardi Award winner.

Talent is not the problem; the schedule is.

"I don't think we've ever played a tougher schedule," says Coach Barry Switzer. "We've played Ohio State or Southern Cal and then Texas in the past. But we've never had a UCLA, Miami, Texas and Nebraska in one year. We're not quite as good defensively and ought to be a little better offensively."

On hand to console Switzer is sophomore quarterback Jamelle Holieway, who took over during the fourth game last year when Troy Aikman (ironically, Aikman has since transferred to UCLA but must sit out the 1986 season) suffered a broken ankle. In the next eight games, Oklahoma averaged more than 300 yards rushing and twice scored more than 50 points.

Holieway has plenty of help. The offensive line returns all but one starter. Tight end Keith Jackson was a second team All-American last year and none of the returning full-time running backs averaged less than 4.6 yards per carry.

The good news is that everyone else returns, led by junior linebacker Brian Bosworth, an All-American and the Butkus Award winner. The secondary is deep and talented and the kicking game is solid.

As usual, Oklahoma's toughest competition in the Big Eight is expected to come from Nebraska, which returns 14 starters.

"Overall defensively we have a chance to be very good, particularly if (linebacker Marc) Munford is ready to go," says Coach Tom Osborne, whose team has won at least nine games in each of his 13 seasons. Munford had surgery to repair knee damage last year.

The big questions on offense are whether sophomore quarterback Steve Taylor can run the attack and whether Doug DuBose, the first Cornhusker to rush for 1,000 yards in both his sophomore and junior seasons, will be penalized by the NCAA for a car purchase.

Oklahoma State has a big defensive hole to fill with the graduation of All-American tackle Leslie O'Neal. But the Cowboys have one of the nation's top runners in Thurman Thomas and two superb defensive backs in All-American Mark Moore and Mike Hudson.

Colorado was the most improved team in the country last year, going from 1-10 in 1984 to 7-5 while learning the Wishbone offense. Kansas (Bob Valsente) and Kansas State (Stan Parrish) will be breaking in new coaches, while Iowa State is being investigated by the NCAA and Missouri enters 1986 off a 1-10 campaign and having lost heralded freshman tailback Tony VanZant to a knee injury.

Michigan finished second to Oklahoma in The Associated Press poll last year and the Wolverines are poised to make another run this fall with 44 lettermen returning.

The graduates included tight end Eric Kattus, cornerback Brad Cochran and All-American defensive tackle Mike Hammerstein. But returning are quarterback Jim Harbaugh — who led the nation in passing efficiency — and seven other starters on offense, plus six defensive regulars, led by cornerback Garland Rivers.

Although Iowa won the Big Ten championship last year, things are expected to be back to normal, meaning a Michigan-Ohio State race.

Ohio State quarterback Jim Karsatos set school records with a 61.2 percent completion rate and 19 touchdown passes. Split end Cris Carter caught a school record 58 passes, eight for touchdowns. The top linemen are center Bob Maggs and linebacker Chris Spielman.

Michigan State returns junior tailback Lorenzo White, who led the nation in rushing with 1,908 yards.

Regardless of what kind of race Michigan and Ohio State wage, the Midwest spotlight will be on Notre Dame, where Lou Holtz, a wisecracking disciplinarian, replaces Gerry Faust as head coach. The Irish don't have defensive depth or the type of quarterback who likes to run the option, although Steve Beuerlein is the leading passer in Notre Dame history.

Elsewhere, the top teams figure to be Penn State in the East; Alabama and Miami in the South; Texas A&M in the Southwest; UCLA on the West Coast and Brigham Young in the Rockies.

Penn State was 11-0 and ranked No. 1 after the 1985 regular season but lost to Oklahoma in the Orange Bowl. With 37 of the top 44 players returning, the Nittany Lions appear to be loaded. The standouts include tailback D.J. Dozier, linebacker Shane Conlan and the defensive line, which has all four starters back and is considered the team's strength.

For the first time since 1968, Syracuse has put together three consecutive winning seasons. The Orangemen, who lost to Penn State 24-20 last year on a late fumble, are hoping to challenge for Eastern honors now that Don McPherson has settled the quarterback position.

West Virginia will have another solid defense, led by linebacker Matt Smith.

Pitt, which has holes on both lines and in the secondary, is rebuilding under new Coach Mike Gottfried and Army, one of the nation's surprise teams the last two years, hopes that quarterback Tory Crawford can keep its Wishbone attack perking. Boston College is trying to rebound in the year of A.D. (After Doug Flutie) 2.

Alabama is favored in the Southeastern Conference thanks to the return of 17 starters from last year's 9-2-1 squad, including quarterback Mike Shula and Cornelius Bennett, one of the nation's top linebackers.

Five other teams have been mentioned as SEC contenders and the Crimson Tide must face four of them — Florida, defending champion Tennessee, LSU and Auburn — along with non-league opponents Ohio State, Penn State and Notre Dame. The sixth SEC challenger is expected to be Georgia.

Campus probe results in state investigation

All-American linebacker Michael Brooks heads an LSU defense that has 10 starters back and Tennessee returns nine defensive regulars, including all-conference linebacker Dale Jones. Despite the loss of Heisman Trophy winner Bo Jackson, Auburn still figures to have the SEC's top running back in Brent Fullwood, who averaged more than seven yards per carry last year as Jackson's backup. Florida returns all-conference quarterback Kerwin Bell, who threw for 21 touchdowns.

Miami, which handed Oklahoma its only setback, returns 18 starters, including quarterback Vinny Testaverde and defensive tackle Jerome Brown.

Florida State, another Southern independent, has seven starters returning on both offense and defense.

South Carolina will go to the run-and-shoot offense to take advantage of outstanding receivers such as Sterling Sharpe, Ryan Bethea and Raynard Brown, plus new quarterback Todd Ellis. Virginia Tech figures to be strong defensively, led by end Morgan Roane.

Maryland, which has won 17 straight Atlantic Coast Conference games, figures to make a strong run at its fourth consecutive championship, with the greatest challenge coming from Clemson and Georgia Tech.

The Texas A&M Aggies are favored to repeat as Southwest Conference champions. They return 20 of the 22 players who started in the last four games, including quarterback Kevin Murray, who passed for a record 292 yards against Auburn in the Cotton Bowl. The defense is anchored by All-American linebacker Johnny Holland.

Baylor, the only SWC team to beat A&M in 1985, will be loaded again. Baylor has 16 regulars returning, including quarterback Cody Carlson, linebacker Ray Berry, All-American free safety Thomas Everett and cornerback Ron Francis.

Arkansas is a contender, although the Razorbacks must replace seven starters from a defense which did not allow a rushing touchdown in its last nine games. Texas, which will have its best team speed in years, returns 15 starters and placekicker Jeff Ward, who has accounted for 30 percent of the Longhorns' victories the last three years.

Southern Methodist and Texas Christian are on NCAA probation and ineligible for a bowl. Houston, Texas, Texas A&M and Texas Tech are either conducting in-house investigations or are being checked by the NCAA for possible rules violations.

UCLA, which once won eight consecutive NCAA basketball championships, now has a string in football — four consecutive New Year's Day bowl games and four victories. Nebraska (1971-75) is the only school to win five in a row.

The Bruins must be considered the team to beat in the Pac-10 and will start their bid for national honors when they visit Oklahoma on Sept. 6. Six starters on offense and eight on defense return.

Washington should improve on last year's 7-5 record with players like quarterback Chris Chandler, running backs Rick Fenney and Vince Weathersby, wide receiver Lonzell Hill and defensive lineman Reggie Rogers.

Arizona State returns 15 starters from an 8-4 team that missed playing in the Rose Bowl because it couldn't hold a 13-3 second-half lead over Arizona. Quarterback Jeff Van Raaphorst and several members of an outstanding defense are among the returnees.

Arizona has 17 starters back, including quarterback Alfred Jenkins. Southern Cal has several question marks. Probably the most significant one is the quarterback position, where Rodney Peete will be stationed if he is recovered from a torn Achilles tendon suffered at the end of last season.

Cal was 4-7 last fall, but the Bears figure to be much better with linebacker Hardy Nickerson already a star and running back Marc Hicks a potential one.

BYU has dominated the Western Athletic Conference for years, and while the Cougars are the team to beat again as they seek their 10th consecutive title, it might not be easy. For one thing, they were hit hard by graduation. For another, Utah and Air Force have some pretty potent weapons.

Fresno State is coming off a Pacific Coast Athletic Association championship and an 11-0-1 season — the Bulldogs were the only unbeaten Division I-A team.

Bowling Green will be out to defend its Mid-American Conference title under new Coach Moe Ankney.

The forestry department has 329 cooperative agreements with more than 500 separate fire protection districts.

According to an Aug. 30 press release from the Office of University Relations, Jay Schultz, head of the forestry department and state forester, became suspicious during a routine program review that equipment obtained from the federal government was not being delivered to the fire districts. He called for the investigation.

The release said University officials now believe the scheme was designed to illegally divert for private use large amounts of federal surplus vehicles and equipment intended for rural fire districts.

Schultz confirmed in July that the investigation has led to the resignation of a member of the forestry department.

He refused to name the person or tell what type of position the individual occupied.

Cy Wainscott, managing editor for University Relations, said the resignation probably came about because "the person who resigned was responsible for the area requiring federal funds and also the administrative program."

Beckom confirmed Sunday that no charges have been filed in the investigation.

Attorney General Robert Stephan has been aware of the investigation since it was initiated in June, Beckom said.

The investigation began on June 10 as an ongoing administrative project review of the forestry department. The department then filed an official complaint with campus police.

Authorities from the campus police have been working in conjunction with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in the forestry department investigation.

University officials said campus police have turned over more than 300 pages of investigation documentation to the KBI. The material, along with material KBI has been collecting, is being given to the Kansas attorney general.

Beckom said the material represents nearly 400 hours of investigation and hundreds of miles in travel.

In July, Wainscott was quoted as saying, "There is something positive that can be seen in all this. The system of checks and balances in the University works. Schultz himself was able to spot that something was wrong in the department and started the investigation process.

"From my point of view this fact is very encouraging," Wainscott said.

Clark believes pitching carries squads to wins

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Mike Clark wants to bring the equalizer to K-State.

Clark, the Wildcats newly appointed baseball coach, came to K-State via Northeastern Oklahoma A&M Junior College where he compiled a 293-136 record during a seven-year stint at the junior college powerhouse.

Clark brings with him a master plan to turn around the sagging fortunes of the baseball team. It is the same plan he took to Northeastern Oklahoma A&M when the team had won just 13 games in the three years before his arrival.

The new baseball mentor is a firm believer in the old adage "strong pitching will take care of good hitting." He sees great pitching as a way to bring lesser teams back to their feet again quickly.

"I am going to emphasize pitching a little more than (former K-State) Coach (Gary) Vaught," said Clark, who will be in complete charge of the hurlers. "Pitching is one of the areas we are going to work on this fall. Last season the (K-State) team had a staff earned run average of more than 6.00.

"If you look back at the teams that were in the College World Series," he said, "they all had great pitching. You can get by with a leaky offense sometimes if you have the pitching to carry you through."

Clark said he will use the fall campaign to become acquainted with his new personnel and see what type of players he will be handling this year.

Clark did not recruit any of the players on this year's team. The Wildcats' recruiting had already been completed by Vaught before he left in June to head the Oral Roberts University program.

There is no preference, Clark said, to whether the squad will be a running or a power-hitting team. That will be left up to the talent and characteristics the team displays this fall.

"We are going to run the program first class," Clark said. "The people will see good hustling baseball and winning baseball. I can't tell you if we are going to be a running club or a home run hitting team (until I see the players).

"I've had ball clubs steal 200 bases and I've had ball clubs hit lots of home runs. We are just going to exploit our talents. We will know by the end of fall what it will take."

Clark takes over a ball club that reached the Big Eight Conference post-season tournament in Vaught's first year, then slumped to a disappointing 24-34 record and a last-place conference finish last year.

Vaught used promotions to try and lure fans to Frank Myers Field during his two-year stint. And, although Clark plans to launch a few of his own attendance-boosting ideas, he said he believes winning, and winning alone, will bring fans out to watch his club.

"I talked to Kenny Mossman (administrative assistant for the athletic department) about getting people out," Clark said. "We are going to get purple fireworks to shoot off after every home run and do some other promotions. But, the key to keeping people out is winning and being entertaining."

Recruiting is another area Clark plans on concentrating keenly on during the upcoming recruiting season. He wants to hit the high school ranks a little more than Vaught, who recruited mainly junior college talent. He also wants to pluck some strong arms to man his pitching staff.

"We are going to evaluate during the fall whether we need a quick fix or whether we can go to the high school kids," Clark said. "Stable programs have high school kids and let them adjust their first year if needed.

"I've had nine pitchers drafted in the last three years. I have been fortunate in the past to recruit some fine arms," he said.

Staff/Brad Fanshier

New K-State baseball coach Mike Clark sees success for the Wildcats if he can beef up the team's power and increase the pitching staff's effectiveness.

Campus probe results in state investigation

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

After a review by the Riley County attorney, the results of an ongoing campus investigation will be sent to the Kansas attorney general for further evaluation, Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police, said Sunday.

The investigation involved the alleged misuse of surplus government equipment within the Department of Forestry.

Beckom said after the results were reviewed by Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy, it was decided the report should be evaluated further by the attorney general.

"The investigation is by no means complete," Beckom said, "but we are at the point now where we feel there is sufficient specific evidence being developed to warrant the involvement of the Attorney General's office."

The equipment involved in the complaint is used to assist rural fire districts throughout the state. Because the forestry department serves as the state forestry agency and extension department, it issues the government-surplus equipment to the districts and takes the equipment back when it is no longer needed.

The forestry department has 329 cooperative agreements with more than 500 separate fire protection districts.

Crew, rugby, soccer clubs look for strong fall-season campaigns

By MARTHA SCHAEFER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's soccer, crew and rugby athletic clubs are looking forward to promising fall seasons.

Each team will start its fall seasons in September. The soccer team kicks off its season Sept. 13 at the University of Kansas. The crew team will go to Des Moines, Iowa, for a regatta Sept. 27 and the rugby team will start its season on Sept. 6 with an alumni game. The regular season for the rugby team will begin on Sept. 13 against the Topeka Rugby Club at the L.P. Washburn intramural fields.

Soccer coach Clay Ross expects his team to have a successful year.

"We're one of the most organized clubs around (the Midwest)," Ross said.

The team is coming off a year when it finished a deceiving fifth place in the Big Eight and won K-State's own Ed Chartrand Memorial Tournament in Kansas City.

Most of the team's funding comes through alumni donations, fund raisers run by the squad's players and a Student Governing Association allocation of $789.

Players which comprise the team's "A" and "B" squads join the team through word of mouth, advertising in the Collegian and by supplying information at tables in the K-State Union and during the K-State Activities Carnival.

The object of the K-State crew team's fall season, said Aaron Ross, vice president of the K-State Rowing Association, is to train new members in proper rowing techniques.

This year also marks the beginning of a team from Manhattan High School which the K-State crew team will sponsor. Coach Don Rose will head up the team and the high school squad will use the Wildcats' boats and practice with the University team.

The men's team appears to be very strong this season, Ross said. The squad has many returning members who will add experience to the team.

Many members graduated from the women's team and with only five retuning members, the team will be in a transition period this fall, Ross said.

Both men's and women's rowing teams were soundly defeated Aug. 16-18 at the 84th Northwest International Regatta in Duluth, Minn., but said he Rose thought the teams benefited from the experience.

"The regatta was a rude awakening for our teams, but it was still good exposure for the team even though we didn't do very well," Rose said.

At Duluth, 17 clubs participated in the regatta including crews from Canada. The relatively young age of the rowers and the difference in rowing seasons were two reasons the teams did not fare well, Rose said.

Staff/Andy Nelson

The K-State Crew will spend most of the fall season training new members in proper rowing techniques for spring competition.

Many team members were students from Manhattan High School, and they lacked the age and experience of the teams from Canada and states such as Minnesota, he said.

Last spring the rugby team was ranked in the top 10 in the nation and completed the season with a 10-5 record. The squad lost to the United States Air Force Acadamy in the final game of the Western Regional finals in Las Cruces, N.M.

Two players from that team were awarded honorable mentions on the tournament team. Dave Todd and Brian Riedel were honored for their play and team member Greg Barnes was named the tournament's most valuable player.

This season the team returns many experienced and talented players, said team public relations director Jeff Stanley. The team also enters the season ranked second in its territory.

The team is coached by Dave Mullin and will have four home matches on its fall schedule.

Wildcat golfers drive for Big 8 recognition

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Golf coach Rob Sedorcek may need to carry a roster the first week of practice to identify all the new faces adorning his men's squad this year, yet he wishes the women's team had it so good.

Sedorcek, K-State's first-year coach, was given the task of resurrecting the Wildcat golf program from the Big Eight cellar and lifting them into an upper-division contender. He found a bevy of hopefuls to redirect the men's team, but he found the pickings slim on the women's side.

Shortly after taking the job last spring, Sedorcek announced the signing of four high school players to letters of intent. As well, he will welcome one junior-college transfer, Troy Kellar, and a transfer from Eastern New Mexico University, Greg Martin, to this year's squad.

Sedorcek inked high school standouts Tim Jennings and his own brother Jeff Sedorcek from Kansas City Ward High School, as well as Todd Fowler and Jeff Shields from Illinois and Missouri, respectively.

On the women's side, he found out how tough it is to go head-to-head with the golf powerhouses in the Midwest. Sedorcek managed to sign just one woman, Lawrence's Jill Zintara, to a letter of intent.

"I found out just how hard it is to compete against the Oklahomas, the Oklahoma States, the Tulsas and New Mexicos," he said. "These are the schools I lost most of my recruiting list to."

The women's team returns seniors Paige Harrison, Erin Andrew and Shelley Sherman while the men return Daran Neuschafer, Curt Fowler and K.C. Byrne.

Sedorcek said although his squad will be young, his newcomers have a tremendous amount of playing savvy under their belts from precollegiate competition.

"The freshmen are playing real well," he said. "They are where I expected them to be. They have a lot of tournament experience from high school and junior golf.

"I hate to brag about my own brother," Sedorcek said, "but he is our best prospect thus far. He beat last yar's Big Eight Newcomer of the Year three out of five times in tournaments this past summer. He is really playing well."

Jeff Sedorcek also captured the Kansas class 5A state championship last spring.

The women "will have a lot of experience at the top. The three seniors should be counted on to play well," Sedorcek said. "If they work hard, they should be able to compete."

Gadhafi tells crowd 'Reagan's a madman'

By The Associated Press

TRIPOLI, Libya — Moammar Gadhafi celebrated his 17th anniversary as Libya's leader Monday by deriding President Reagan and praising Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev, saying the Libyans and Russians share common interests.

"Reagan is a madman, physically and psychologically sick," Gadhafi told a flag-waving crowd of 5,000 in Green Square, gathered to hail the Sept. 1, 1969, military coup that brought him to power.

As the crowd held aloft his portrait and applauded, the 44-year-old colonel gestured with a silver pointer as he vowed to recruit an army from Central America, Africa and Asia if the United States didn't cease what he called its confrontational policies.

"If Reagan doesn't stop his stupidities I will form an international army to fight America everywhere, and I'm sure that in a few years the world will be rid of this new Nazi empire," he said.

The crowd shouted, "When you call us, oh commander, we will leap into the fire!"

Flanked by Soviet officials, Gadhafi later reviewed a 90-minute military parade by more than 18,000 soldiers and Soviet-made tanks, SA-5 surface-to-air missiles and Scud ground-to-ground missiles.

Gadhafi mixed insults to Reagan and criticism of U.S. policy in his speech with compliments for Moscow, which he said stood by its responsibilities toward Libya.

The Soviets have supplied Libya with two frigates, MiG jet fighters and military transport planes to replace losses from U.S. attacks in the Gulf of Sidra in March and on Tripoli and Benghazi in April.

Gadhafi's anti-American outburst came after four months of silence following the U.S. air raid on April 15, when sites hit included his home in Tripoli. An adopted baby daughter was one those killed in the air strikes.

Washington said the strike was in retaliation for purported Libyan support of terrorist attacks

Coroner cites heart attack in air crash

By The Associated Press

CERRITOS, Calif. — The man believed to have piloted the small plane that collided with a jetliner, killing all 67 people on the planes and leaving 15 missing and feared dead, suffered a heart attack minutes before the collision, a coroner's spokesman said.

The single-engine Piper Archer was not in contact with controllers directing air traffic in restricted airspace near Los Angeles International Airport, where the planes collided Sunday and plummeted into a residential area, said John Lauber, a National Transportation Safety Board supervisor.

Authorities said 64 people, including at least 47 U.S. residents, were aboard Aeromexico Flight 498, a DC-9 from Mexico City that was on its landing approach to Los Angeles, and three people were in the Piper when the planes collided a few minutes before noon Sunday.

The planes fell into an upper-middle-class neighborhood, littering streets, homes and trees in a six- by eight-block section with steel, flesh, charred cars, luggage and ashes.

"A man in his 50s, believed to be the pilot of the small craft...suffered occlusive coronary artery disease," in addition to multiple injuries in the crash, said Bill Gold, a spokesman for the Los Angeles County coroner's office.

"This condition can be called a heart attack," Gold said. "He may have lived if there wasn't a collision. The heart attack itself wasn't fatal."

Coroner's officials couldn't determine the exact time the heart attack occurred, only that it was before the collision, Gold said.

"We were unable to determine at what time it occurred or how severe it was," Gold said. "The heart attack came minutes before his death, but the cause of death was his injuries."

The pilot of the small plane may have been William Kramer, who recently moved to Los Angeles from Spokane, Wash., a relative said.

Robert Kirkpatrick of Spokane, Wash., said the Los Angeles coroner's office notified his former wife, Suzanne Kirkpatrick of Spokane, that her father, mother and sister were in the small plane.

Soviet liner rams freighter, sinks in Black Sea

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — A 61-year-old Soviet ship big enough to carry at least 870 passengers collided with a freighter at night in the Black Sea and sank with a loss of lives, officials said Monday. They did not give a casualty figure.

Foreign radio monitors said they did not hear a distress signal after the collision between the passenger ship and Soviet freighter Sunday night.

Search and rescue operations continued Monday night, about 20 hours after the ship went down, according to officials in the Black Sea ports of Odessa and Novorossiysk.

A Naval Ministry official said by telephone late Monday that the freighter remained afloat. He would not answer other questions.

Soviet media carried only a brief statement from the Communist Party Central Committee and Soviet government. It was the second sinking of a Soviet passenger liner in seven months.

The official announcement, distributed by the Tass news agency, said only that the 17,053-ton Admiral Nakhimov "collided with a cargo ship not far from Novorossiysk" and sank "on the night of Aug. 31."

"Rescue measures have been taken," the official news agency said. "The necessary assistance is rendered to those affected. There has been loss of life."

It did not say how many people were aboard, how many were dead, if any foreigners were among the passengers, or what route the ship was following.

Lloyd's Registry of Ships, published in London, says the ship had berths for 870 passengers. A Soviet citizen who sailed on it in 1971 said many other fourth-class passengers customarily slept on the uppermost of its four decks.

The Admiral Nakhimov, which Lloyd's says is 575 feet long, was built in Germany in 1925 as a steam-powered vessel and later refitted with diesel engines.

An official of the Black Sea fleet in Novorossisyk, reached by telephone from Moscow, said that whether ship went down late Sunday night or very early Monday still was not known. That indicated it sank quickly.

Infrared imaging aids human, thermal environment study

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

Infrared imaging, originally designed for military use, is finding more peaceful uses in the College of Engineering.

The Institute for Environmental Research bought the infrared imaging equipment a little less than a year ago and is using it primarily for the study of human beings and their interaction in the thermal environment, said Byron Jones, associate professor of mechanical engineering.

The equipment was bought with a grant from the National Science Foundation and matching funds from the University, Jones said.

He said the studies measure, among other things, how people are affected by air conditioners and the thermal transfer abilities of their clothing.

"The important parameter (for the imaging equipment) is that (it is) looking at the skin temperature and clothing temperature profile," said Jones, who is also director of the institute. "It is strictly a surface thing."

He said the device is similar to a standard videotape camera except that it looks at wavelengths of light that are invisible to the human eye.

"All bodies emit radiation," Jones said. "The warmer the body, the longer the wavelengths."

However, the idea of infrared imaging becomes more complicated when the emissivity rating is taken into account, he said.

Emissivity is the characteristic of a body's ability to emit radiation, Jones said.

Every surface or body has a different emissivity rating, and this affects the measurements of the infrared imaging device, he said.

When a body is "shot," an image is made of it. The device creates a false-color picture with colors representing a range of temperatures, Jones said. The sensitivity of the device can be adjusted to a wide range of temperatures.

Although the institute's main area of study is the interaction of the human body with its thermal environment, a copper mannequin is the primary body shot by the imaging device.

"The main advantage of the mannequin is that it's repeatable," Jones said. "People aren't consistent. You can measure someone one day and measure them differently the next."

Even if the mannequin is used for tests, people are still the beneficiaries of the research.

One of the studies made by the institute involved the protective clothing worn by firefighters or other emergency workers, Jones said.

The concern was with heat and moisture transfer through the clothing and how those clothing systems work, he said.

"People in protective clothing can't sweat through it," he said.

"The thermal danger (of sweating in the clothing) might be more dangerous than the chemical (danger)," he said, referring to chemical or whatever other environment in which the worker might be wearing the clothing.

Among some of the ongoing projects at the institute, the thermal qualities of sleeping bags, and the materials in them, are also tested using the infrared imaging device. These tests are conducted for private companies, he said.

A new project at the institute will study the effects of vibrations on the hand.

"The hand was not made to vibrate," said Stephan Konz, professor of industrial engineering, in a press release. "As it vibrates, blood flows out, and the hand gets cold. This can cause pain and injury."

Konz said the tests are still in the calibration stages and results won't

Bombing injures 18 in S. Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A bomb left at the parcel counter Monday blew out the front of a store in a middle-class white suburb of Durban. Police said 18 blacks and whites were injured, including a 3-year-old girl.

"The whole place was filled with smoke within minutes," said Larry McDonald, a pharmacist. "There was chaos. People were screaming and running." Dr. John Keenan, acting chief of emergency services for Natal province, said the 3-year-old white child and four other people were seriously wounded. The government and witnesses said the casualties were 12 employees and six customers.

It was the ninth bombing since the government imposed a nationwide state of emergency June 12 in an attempt to quell racial unrest and started arresting thousands of people without charges.

The bomb demolished the front windows of a Pick 'n Pay store in the Montclair shopping center and tore a hole in the ceiling, said Vernon Mitchell, general manager of the chain of budget department stores.

Scientists find causes of gas deaths

YAOUNDE, Cameroon — U.S. scientists studying the eruption of volcanic gases that claimed more than 1,700 lives said Monday the victims died of asphyxiation related to respiratory or cardiac failure.

In the first written report to the government, the U.S. forensic pathologists also largely ruled out the possibility of seismic or volcanic activity as the cause of the deadly gas that spewed out of Lake Nios on Aug. 21.

Their preliminary report said the cloud of gas contained large amounts of carbon dioxide and hydrogen sulfide gas. It said "the gas cloud probably changed character as it moved away from the lake, probably due to the oxidation of the sulphur compounds."

The sulphur compounds combined with water droplets in the air to form acids that burned many of the survivors on the face, arms, trunk and legs, according to the report.

Texas Senate passes parimutuel bill

AUSTIN, Texas — The Texas Senate gave final legislative approval Monday to a bill that could legalize parimutuel gambling on horse and dog racing.

On a voice vote, the Senate sent to Gov. Mark White the bill, which would repeal a 1937 statewide ban on parimutuel betting.

Included in the legislation is a provision to put the question on the general election ballot in November 1987. A statewide referendum on parimutuel wagering was one of the provisions White has demanded in any racing legislation.

The Legislature has been meeting in special session to discuss solutions to the state's fiscal crisis, which stems largely from declining oil revenues. The state would share in the profits of parimutuel gambling, though the exact formula has not been worked out.

Lewis Telethon raises $34 million

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — The Jerry Lewis Labor Day Telethon raised a record $34,096,773 Monday to soar past the $400 million mark for the 21-year history of the event.

Lewis predicted the Muscular Dystrophy Association, beneficiary of the telethon, would raise $80 million to $90 million this year, including gifts from dozens of corporations, civic and professional groups.

"We won't go to the government for help," Lewis said during an appeal. "We don't want to ask for permission to save a child."

It is the 36th year Lewis has worked with the association, which fights some 40 muscle-destroying diseases, many of which are fatal and most of which strike children.

Lewis said this year's goal was $1 more than the record $33,181,652 raised in 1985. "One dollar more than last year, that's all I ever promise my kids," Lewis said.

The crowd at Caesar's Palace cheered as last year's mark was passed, the donation total lighting up on an electronic tote board, then again in the final five minutes of the telethon, when the board flashed the $34,096,773 total.

President Reagan called Lewis near the beginning of the show and praised the comedian for his efforts, which he said were a good example of people reaching out to help other people.

Actress, 84, to make 106th movie

MINNEAPOLIS — Lillian Gish is about to embark on her 106th movie in a career that began 84 years ago at age 5.

During a weekend appearance for a tribute to her late actress sister Dorothy, Gish showed little wear and tear and was gracious, witty and enthusiastic.

"She's the more talented of the two of us," the actress said of her sister, who died in 1968. "And I'm here to prove it."

Gish starts on location in Maine on Sept. 8 for a new film with Bette Davis. She was the weekend guest of the Society for Cinephiles, an organization for fans of early film.

"I was put to work at the age of 5," Gish said. "I never went to school. We were poor. We went to bed hungry sometimes, but we loved each other. I had a happy life."

Puerto Rican family swims channel

DOVER, England — A Puerto Rican couple and their four children have swum from England to France to become the first relay team made up of one family to swim across the English Channel.

The Hauck family, of Santurce, made the 21-mile crossing in 11 hours and 13 minutes Sunday.

"It was tough," Harry Hauck, 57, said Monday. "We all had problems of some kind, mainly brought on by cold air temperature when the afternoon sun went in and darkness descended for the last few hours. The sea also got rough in the latter stages."

His wife Caroll, 49, was seasick; son Jason, 17, had a dislocated knee; Harry Jr., 29, had asthma; and daughter Krista, 24, had food

Sculpture depicts life of U.S. farm family

By The Associated Press

BONNER SPRINGS — Politicians expressed guarded hope for the future of farming and protesters lamented its present condition as the National Farmers' Memorial was dedicated Monday at the Agricultural Hall of Fame.

"It's my hope, even in these very difficult times, that we'll find a better way," Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., said during the ceremony in Bonner Springs, located west of Kansas City.

Officials are doing their best to develop a policy that "in the late '80s and early '90s, will mean prosperity for the American farmer and the American farm family," Dole said.

Addressing a crowd of about 1,200 people, Dole stood in front of the three-section bronze sculpture that forms the centerpiece of the memorial. The three 10-foot by 11-foot panels pay tribute to the past, present and future of agriculture.

During the ceremony, five Kansas farmers associated with the American Agriculture Movement Inc. demonstrated behind the domed structure. One held an American flag, and two others carried black flags they said signified "the dying farmer."

One of the protesters, Helmer Siemsen of Ellsworth, Kan., held a black flag as he said Dole was not helping the cause of small farmers.

Center provides guidance for problems

By LORI LUGINBILL
Collegian Reporter

Relationship problems from roommate disagreements to family disputes cause faculty members and students to seek help at the Kansas State Family Center.

The center, located behind King Hall, has been providing training and services under the direction of the College of Human Ecology since 1972.

Tony Jurich, clinical director of the center and professor of family and child development, said the facility serves two major functions. One is applied training for undergraduate and graduate students in such areas as family life, marriage and family therapy.

The second function is to provide services such as counseling, consultation, outreach and support groups to students, faculty, staff and residents of Manhattan and surrounding areas.

"Where we're unique in our provision of services is that we are a family center," Jurich said. "We deal in relationship problems of any kind."

Jurich said the center's goal is to operate in a preventative way to help people before a problem occurs by offering services like premarital counseling.

However, the staff also helps people with problems already occurring. Spouses of students who must focus a great amount of time on their studies, such as those studying veterinary medicine and architecture, are an example, Jurich said.

Steve Bollman, director of the center and professor of family and child development, said many clients are referred by other departments on campus such as the Counseling Center or Lafene Student Health Center.

Clients are also referred to the center by agencies and individuals in the community such as Social Rehabilitative Services, the Crisis Center and ministers, Bollman said.

When clients come to the center for guidance, a minimum of one supervisor is present. Student therapists may also observe a case, but clients can refuse student observation if it makes them uncomfortable, said Eric Weiner, associate director of the center and coordinator of marriage and family therapy services.

"All records of services provided are kept very confidential," Jurich said. "We try to protect the client."

Twenty-five percent of the center's clientele consists of students; 45 percent are Manhattan residents; and 30 percent, including faculty and staff of the University, come from surrounding areas, Jurich said.

The center maintains about 35 to 40 cases a month, Weiner said.

Clients pay for services provided by the center according to a sliding fee scale, Jurich said. The fee is based on ability to pay.

"We don't refuse anyone, even if a client can only pay a dollar a session," Jurich said. "At the Family Center, clients pay less and get more."

The center is recognized at the national level, Jurich said.

City plans additions without raising funds

Like the proverbial caboose before the train, the city of Manhattan is getting ahead of itself. It is allocating funds before it is sure the funds can be raised to complete the projects.

The Manhattan City Commission decided to spend money and allow B G Consultants to complete preliminary designs for the widening of Seth Child Road after the state turned down funding of the project. The project is estimated at $5.4 million.

The minor detail of when the "money fairy" was going to visit Manhattan was swept under the carpet but will reappear tonight at the city commission meeting.

The city is planning to submit another request for money. If the requests are rejected repeatedly, the mill levy may be raised to fund the project.

The ideas behind the projects are good and make sense to keep Manhattan growing. But, people who use charge cards wrongly and spend money they don't have eventually get themselves into trouble. A city can also get in too deep and not be able to come through with the money nor the finished product — take a look at "The Big Apple."

Union reorganization increases inefficiency

Employees at the Union were extremely busy this summer, as evidenced by the major organizational and structural changes in the Stateroom and Union Bookstore.

Although the bookstore was not reorganized beyond recognition, many students and faculty are beginning to wonder about the purpose of the Stateroom changes.

Early rising faculty who go for coffee in the Union have been overheard asking caustically where the coffee was that morning. It seems the coffee urns are either located in places hard to find or places hard to get to.

For people with slick-soled shoes, buying lunch at the Union could be a life-threatening situation because there seems to be water on the floor more often than not. And not just in one place, but all over.

Congestion is another problem that seems to have grown instead of dissipitated because of food service renovations. Although the 10:30 a.m. crowd is diverse — some people wanting breakfast and others wanting lunch — the congestion should not be that bad any time of the day.

The final annoying change food service has made would not, on the surface, appear that major. But for those accustomed to the luxury of Styrofoam cups for all sizes of carbonated and non-carbonated drinks, an adjustment to clear thin-plastic cups that sweat and allow ice to melt rapidly is asking a lot.

Parrish's enthusiasm ignites Wildcats, fans

It was refreshing to see the 'Cats win at home Saturday. In fact, it was refreshing to see the Wildcats win.

More than 26,000 football fans witnessed something they haven't seen in four years, a season-opening victory.

Stan Parrish and his team gave fans something to wave about, and wave they did, around the stadium on two occasions.

Those in attendance could not help but feel the energy generated from the team and 'Cats' coaches as they blew past Western Illinois, 35-7. And if Parrish's display of energy in the home opener is any indication, he could become known as one of the most emotional coaches in the conference.

Each Wildcat success on the field was transformed into a burst of elation on Parrish's face.

The game probably got under the Leatherneck's skin, but gave K-State players, fans and coaches an optimistic outlook on the rest of the season, leaving them hungry for more.

So, hats off to the Wildcats. Let's chalk up a few more paw prints in the win column.

Student reflects on year in Europe

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

Coming home to the United States in July was an unforgettable experience.

My heart swelled with pride as my eyes recognized those three familiar colors held by the Marine Honor Guard. Tears of joy couldn't be held back as the president shook my hand and said, "Well Dan, on behalf of all Americans I can only say 'we've missed you.'" I fell to my knees and kissed free soil.

But I've gotten ahead of my story. May I keep you from the crossword and Bloom County for five minutes to introduce myself?

My full name is "Daniel James Owens," a lengthy title by which I rarely refer to myself. My parents would sometimes say "Daniel James Owens!" in sharp tones to inform me I was about to lose the car keys, and large bureaucracies such as the Internal Revenue Service and K-State have an even lengthier title for me — Daniel James Owens, 514-60-0107. Still, I prefer a shorter title that is easier to confuse with someone else's abbreviated name.

So if you see me on campus, just call me "Dan," especially in phrases like "Hey Dan, great column!" or perhaps "Hey Dan, would you like to have my money?"

I was born and raised in the Kansas City area, spending most of my youth south of Overland Park in a area known as Blue Valley. There I enjoyed many of the things you might have as a kid: hayfever in August, parents' bridge parties and the death of numerous pets.

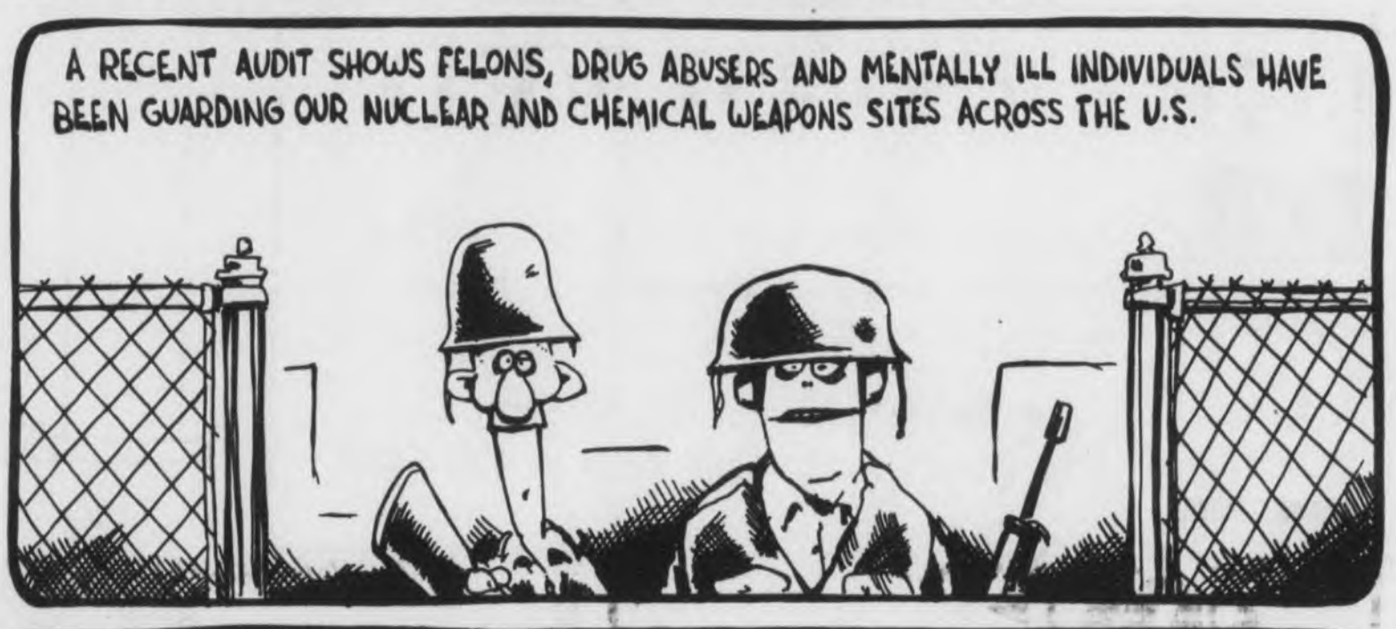
I watched many people with a lot of money move to Blue Valley as I grew up and thus got a first-hand view of "guppies" — greying urban professionals. A lot of their children go to the University of Kansas to live a sort of "Blue Valley without the guppies" lifestyle. That's why I came to K-State.

All that patriotic stuff at the beginning alludes to my return to the United States last July. You see, after spending three years at K-State, this University spent a little money — perhaps some of yours — so I could study in West Germany on scholarship for 10 months. I hope to give this University its money's worth by writing about what I experienced in Europe.

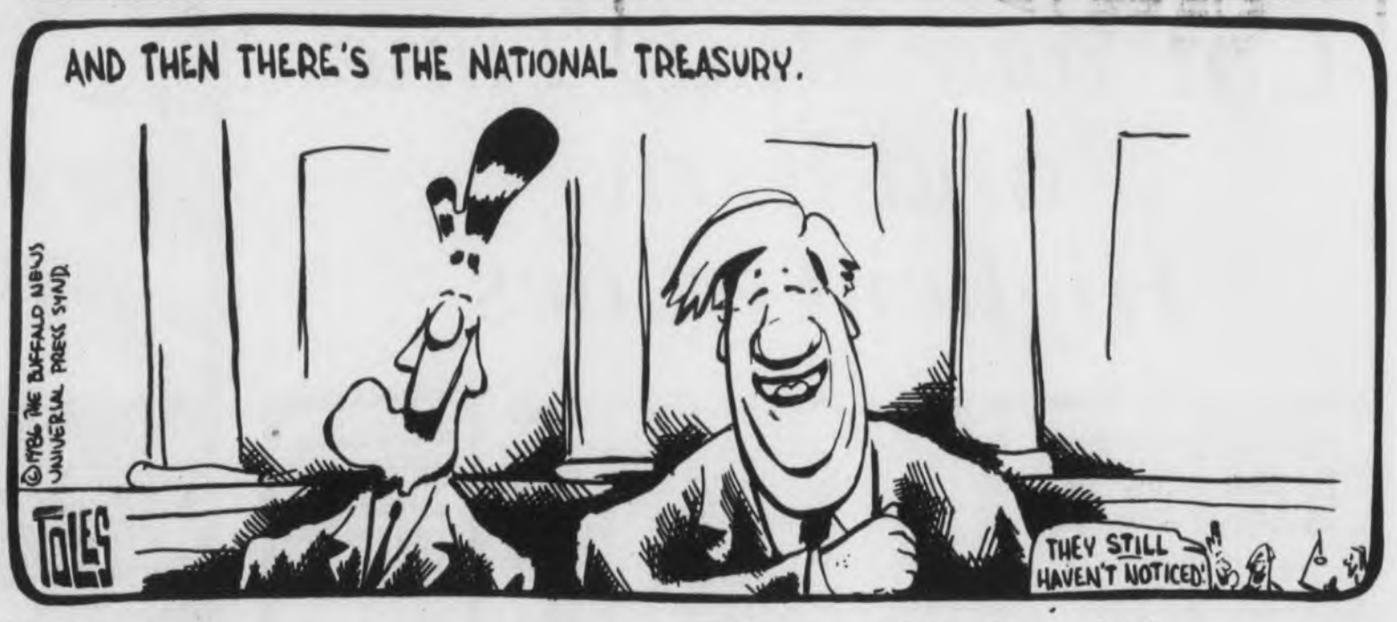
I will write about terrorism, about what it feels like to have a bomb kill 30 people at an airport I visited the previous week, about being advised by my own Army after we bombed an Arabic scapegoat not to wear cowboy hats, play baseball or do anything else that might distinguish me as an American. That's not my idea of standing tall.

I will write about a certain nuclear reactor, one which was apparently run by the Soviet counterparts to Laurel and Hardy, the Three Stooges and James Watt. I, along with much of Europe east of the Rhine River, was nuked by the Chernobyl fallout and have never felt so insecure as I did during those first days when no one knew what was going to happen.

Scientists still debate whether fallout in West Germany was harmful, but fear in the population was certainly real. Just imagine hourly radioactivity reports on KSDB, being told by the government to wash your shoes and Frisbees thoroughly after playing outside, and running around your dorm to close all the windows during a sudden thunderstorm because the rain might give you five-eyed children. My sister suggested that lead underwear might have solved that problem.



I want to tell you what it feels like to go into East Germany and the Soviet Union, what their people think about the Berlin Wall, about basic human rights, and about their own country and ours.



I also will write about the U.S. image in Europe. The whole world is greatly affected by the actions of the United States. We citizens are responsible for ensuring that this enormous power is used responsibly.

By now you've probably guessed there wasn't really a Marine Band to greet me upon my return and I'm not stupid enough to kiss a dirty runway in New York in July. The closest things to the president I had around me were the pictures of Washington and Lincoln in my wallet.

But a feeling of security and well-being definitely came to me as I touched down in Kansas City. The Flint Hills between Topeka and Manhattan were a welcome sight after the cramped spaces of Germany. And campus never looked so green nor seemed more like an old friend.

It's good to come home and have blessings to count.

'Hate' groups smother U.S. liberty

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

This Fourth of July, Americans were caught in a fire of patriotism that swept across the nation as we celebrated the centennial of our most treasured lady, the Statue of Liberty. The celebration was not just a dedication to a national symbol, but a rededication to the cultural and ethnic variety that makes this country unique.

Hiding in the smoke of this fire are racial and religious hatred groups that threaten to smother the flame in Liberty's golden lamp with a blanket of prejudice driven by radical nationalism.

Statistics show that these hatred groups, such as the neo-Nazi Aryan Nation, Ku Klux Klan and Lost-Found Nation of Islam are, in fact, declining in numbers. When the Klan had what it billed as a national convention Saturday in East Windsor, Conn., only three dozen Klan members and supporters attended. Because they are currently about as bothersome as mosquitoes at a summer cookout, it hardly justifies wasting a drop of ink writing about them. However, with today's high technology, these radical organizations pose a threat that promises the spilling of blood in the name of prejudice. It's time to get out the spray insecticide; the mosquitoes are carrying malaria!

The scary future of the neo-Nazis and the Klan is coming of age as they begin pulling off their hoods and start turning on the computers. According to an article in USA Today magazine, two computerized networks of hate already exist in the United States. For a fee of $5, almost anyone with a computer and modem, or phone link-up, can receive a password to gain access into the Aryan Nation Liberty network.

It is immediately brought to the attention of the users of this system that it is "a pro-American, pro-white, anti-Communist network of true believers who serve the one and only God — Jesus, the Christ," as quoted from a message on the computer system. Through this network one is given the latest hate propaganda telling how the Jews have taken over the federal government or, in Nazi terminology, the Zionist Occupational Government. Through the Klan computer, one can also get the dates and places of neo-Nazi and Klan meetings, not to exclude Hitler Youth Rallies.

The most troubling thought about these bigots and their computers is that they provide their members with "enemy lists" and encourage them to use acts of terrorism to eliminate them. The Anti-Defamation League has suggested that the decline of the Klan and neo-Nazis is causing them to resort to these desperate actions.

Among the topics discussed at recent meetings of these hate groups were assassination of government and civil rights leaders, and urban guerilla warfare to be used for their "war against the U.S. government."

Robert Miles, a Klan leader from Michigan, is preparing for the formation of the "Ultras," individuals and groups devoted to the promotion of prejudice through terrorism. Many of these terrorists are currently being recruited in prisons to be ready to go to work as soon as they are released, according to a CBS Evening News report. In addition, future leaders of the Aryan Nations and the Klan are being solicited on college campuses, for they see young people as being most vulnerable to influence, the report stated.

On the other side of the fence, and just as threatening, is Louis Farrakhan and his black-supremacist, anti-Semitic Lost-Found Nation of Islam. Among the few friends of Farrakhan and his bigots is Libyan leader Col. Moammar Gadhafi who recently pledged $5 million to help the hate campaign. Some people speculate that Farrakhan and the Lost-Found Nation of Islam might be cooperating with Gadhafi to help him fulfill his terrorist objectives in the United States.

The insane illusions of Farrakhan and Klan leader Louis Beam are well illustrated by the words of Aryan Nation leader Richard Butler: "There exists only one issue — race! Race is the political issue, the moral issue, the war issue, the religious issue, and the issue of all law. There exists no issue that does not have race as its foundation."

The attitude and threats of these radical fanatics is not being taken lightly by law enforcement officers anywhere. At the Klan rally in East Windsor, police wanted to run all those attending through metal detectors to search for weapons. Unfortunately, the courts denied them permission to do so. It's sad that the courts give prison sentences, and justly so, to people who merely joke about killing the president, but refuse police the privilege of using metal detectors to screen people who seriously want to exterminate an entire race.

In the 100 years that the Statue of Liberty has been enlightening America, we have overcome countless racial and religious barriers while the radical bigots have become rejects of society and slipped into extinction. In the next 100 years these groups must not become a force, so that Liberty's torch will illuminate a nation that is entirely dedicated to being a country where all are created equal and fanatical bigots can only be read about in history books.

Police attempt rescue, prompt riot on beach

By The Associated Press

HUNTINGTON BEACH, Calif. — Thousands of people watching a surfing contest went on a rampage after police tried to rescue several women whose bikini tops had been torn off, and 13 people were arrested before order was restored.

Six emergency vehicles were burned and a lifeguard station was looted during the three-hour disturbance in the sand Sunday.

About 10 officers suffered minor injuries, police Sgt. Ron Jenkins said.

The rioters, estimated at between 2,000 and 5,000 teen-agers and young adults, surrounded the lifeguard station chanting "Anarchy! Anarchy," authorities said.

They broke windows in the station with rocks and bottles, then overturned and set ablaze two black-and-white police cars, an unmarked police car, a police van, a lifeguard Jeep and a three-wheel, all-terrain scooter, Jenkins said.

Thirteen people were arrested, three of them juveniles, for investigation of charges ranging from resisting arrest to assault with a deadly weapon for allegedly pelting police with rocks and bottles.

All but five of them had been released on bail by Monday morning, said Senior Detention Officer Joseph Marucci. He said both men and women were being held.

Some witnesses said club-swinging officers overreacted, but others disagreed.

"The officers were going crazy," said Paul Donovan of Westminster, who had gone to the beach with his wife and three children. "People on bicycles were being kicked over and beaten. They were just beating them."

City Councilman Don McAllister, who was watching the surf meet from an observation tower, disagreed.

"I have nothing but pride for the way the police acted," said McAllister. "I was trapped up there and I could see the police as they were surrounded below us."

The melee began when officers went to the aid of five or six young women whose bathing suit tops had been torn off, said Jenkins.

"I heard someone behind the bleachers yelling, 'Take it off, take it off,'" said Mark Bauserman, 22, a student at nearby Golden West College.

The band of officers, by then about 30 strong, took refuge in the two-story lifeguard station at the Huntington Beach Pier, and the women apparently disappeared into the crowd as the rioters surged around the lifeguard station, Jenkins said.

Emergency shelter sponsors car market

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan's used car lots are getting a little extra competition. On Saturdays, the parking lot of the Blue Hills Shopping Center on Tuttle Creek Boulevard becomes a marketplace where sellers can display their vehicles.

Wheel 'n' Deal has been sponsored by the Manhattan Emergency Shelter since Aug. 23. Entrance fees go to the shelter.

For $10, a prospective salesman can rent a parking space for his car for one day. Wheel 'n' Deal provides a sale facts sheet the owner can fill out and display on the car if he doesn't want to stay all day and talk to potential buyers. If the car does not sell, the owner can bring it back within the month and try again for a reduced entrance fee of $5.

The shelter is sponsoring Wheel 'n' Deal to help cover its operating costs, as well as promote community awareness of its services. Last year, the shelter housed 470 local and transient homeless people. As of August, 275 people have already been housed. Eighty percent of the shelter's clients are local people.

About 15 cars, trucks, motorcycles and other vehicles were displayed at Wheel 'n' Deal's first weekend.

"I'd like to eventually have 20 to 30 vehicles a week here. This first year we were hoping to get 15, so we've been pleased," said Kathy Rankin, shelter director.

"The sellers bring the cars here because they feel like maybe they're not getting enough publicity. They've been trying to sell out of their driveways," she said. "Another thing is that people don't like to advertise where they live, so they have to sit by the phone and make sure they are home."

The shelter is using Wheel 'n' Deal to offset some of the basic costs of providing assistance to needy people. Since the number of people using the shelter is expected to increase, the operating costs are also expected to rise.

"We are a United Way member, but we only receive a fourth of our funding from them," Rankin said. "A fourth comes from the city, and the other 50 percent comes from the community — individuals, churches, service organizations. We also write (applications for) some grants."

Located at 831 Leavenworth St., the shelter provides housing, three meals a day, job preparation and other services to help homeless people get back on their feet. The facility can house 15 guests at a time. Transients are allowed to stay for five days, while local people may use the shelter for 12 days.

Most of the homeless are referred to the shelter by the Riley County Police Department or area churches. However, some of the transients hear about it from others they meet on the road.

"We're not like a lot of shelters. A lot of shelters are just real basic and not really friendly, like a barracks or a warehouse. Ours is set up in a house. It has a home atmosphere," Rankin said.

Two full-time staff people and five part-time staff work at the shelter. Volunteers also donate some time, especially during the busy months.

"Normally from about July through November we just increase right along. It's very slow in December, January and February. I think the people out traveling get tired of the heat," Rankin said.

"Summer utility bills put a lot of people under. In winter, people try to hang in there. A lot of people try to go a few months without bills to get back on their feet and then just give up," Betty Hall, a shelter board of directors member, said.

Wheel 'n' Deal is open from 8 a.m. until 5 p.m. every Saturday from March through November. Its last day of operation this year will be Nov. 22.

Group prepares to sue Pentagon, wants defensive research banned

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An environmental activist group is preparing to sue the Pentagon to stop defensive biological warfare research while simultaneously establishing a fund to encourage scientists to disclose evidence of illegal experiments.

The Foundation on Economic Trends, successful in a similar suit against the Army, also has distributed a position paper to officials from more than 55 foreign governments, suggesting ways to strengthen a 1972 international accord banning the pursuit of biological weapons.

Delegates from more than 100 countries are scheduled to meet in Geneva next week to review the 1972 accord.

The foundation's paper disputes the recently outlined position of the Reagan administration that the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention "must be recognized as critically deficient and unfixable."

The Washington-based research organization has focused its studies in recent years on developments in biological and genetic engineering. The group describes itself as a "clearinghouse for public information" on the political, economic and environmental implications of such research.

The lawsuit against the Pentagon, a copy of which was provided to reporters in advance of its filing in U.S. District Court on Tuesday, seeks to stop all Defense Department research aimed at identifying potential defenses against biological weapons.

Under the 1972 agreement, the United States, Soviet Union and more than 100 other countries have agreed not to develop toxic biological agents for offensive purposes. But the accord does not prohibit defensive research.

The foundation's suit asserts that the Defense Department has expanded defensive research to such a point that it now falls under the National Environmental Policy Act, meaning environmental impact studies must be performed.

It requests both preliminary and permanent injunctions against continued research until environmental impact studies are conducted.

The suit is similar to a successful court action brought by the foundation against the Army. A federal judge issued an injunction in May 1985 that has stopped the Army from building a new biological laboratory at the Dugway Proving Grounds in Utah until it completes an impact study.

The Pentagon declined comment on the latest challenge, noting that it had not seen the suit.

Foundation president Jeremy Rifkin said a $100,000 whistleblower's fund the group is setting up is designed "to protect scientists and their families who might suffer reprisals including loss of job and income and government harassment for publicly disclosing illegal biological weapons research."

Weather, K-Staters shine at parade

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

K-State's Marching Band and the weather both shined for the Family Fun Festival Shrine Parade Saturday in Junction City.

"About 25 or 30 people came up to me to say they thought the K-State Band was the highlight of the entire parade," said Burt Lusenhop, Chairman of the Family Fun Festival Committee. "The K-Staters really strutted their stuff for us."

University President Jon Wefald was the Grand Marshal for the hour and a half parade which was blessed with cooperative weather for the first time in three years.

"The weatherman cooperated much better this year, due largely to the fact that the festival was held four weeks earlier than last year and five weeks earlier than in 1984," said Norm Childs, director of the Geary County Convention and Visitors' Bureau. "We're grateful for the weather and for all the efforts put forth by a large number of people to make all of this happen."

Temperatures were in the upper 70s in the morning and the lower 80s in the afternoon on Saturday. A few sprinkles in the afternoon prompted onlookers to take cover briefly, but failed to bring activities to a halt.

The parade, which began at 11 a.m., traced the same route covered in the last two years. Junction City police estimated the crowd at 8,000 to 10,000.

In addition to the K-State Marching Band, the 1st Infantry Division Band provided marching music. Numerous Shrine units sent delegations, including a unit in Nebraska called "The Mustangs," that brought eight vintage Ford Mustangs. Other units rode in antique cars, motorcycles, motorized tricycles and regular convertibles. The smaller vehicles performed precision drill maneuvers on the streets.

The main road through downtown Junction City was blocked off immediately after the parade for games and competitions, which started at 1 p.m. Saturday. Events included a bathtub race, an adult tricycle race, a water/spoon relay, a three-legged race and a tug of war.

Displays, set up by area residents, offered points of historical significance. The displays included a postal employee who does blacksmithing for a hobby, a hardware store owner who displays authentic American Indian costumes and tents and a U.S. Army staff sergeant who collects Civil War memorabilia, including a Civil War uniform and gear of the era.

At the west end of Uptown Park, a number of local musicians played and sang music representative of the 1860s. Among the performers were George Rodriguez, a local folk singer, and Eddie and Robert Hiebert, from Abilene.

Log-chopping, hay-throwing, greased-pig, cow-milking and pie-eating contests took place Sunday in the park. A sack race, bed race and tug of war were also run. The evening was topped off by a two-hour concert by Wheatland Express.

Monday's events included the tug of war runoffs and a talent show in Eagle's Hall. The weekend festivities ended with an awards ceremony and a raffle for a 1986 Chevy Chevette.

Soviets detain reporter on spy charges

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The KGB secret police held American reporter Nicholas Daniloff in Lefortovo Prison on Sunday as an accused spy, but Daniloff's wife said after visiting him that he was the victim of a barbaric frameup.

A U.S. diplomat also visited Daniloff and said the newsman, a reporter for U.S. News & World Report, could be held indefinitely during the investigation.

"Nick keeps repeating over and over again, 'I am not a spy. I am not gathering intelligence material,'" said Daniloff's wife, Ruth.

She also said Monday that Soviet authorities plan to hold her husband for 10 days before deciding whether to charge him with espionage.

Ruth spoke to reporters outside Moscow's Lefortovo Prison after her second meeting in as many days with her husband. The couple's son, Caleb, 16, also visited his father.

Daniloff, 52, was arrested by the KGB secret police Saturday and accused of spying.

"He will be held for 10 days. At the end of 10 days, they will decide whether they are going to release him or charge him," she said. She did not say who told her about the time span. She said she was not optimistic "because they found this incriminating evidence that was planted on him, so the investigation itself is a complete farce."

She said her husband was in good spirits despite four hours of intensive interrogation after his arrest Saturday.

"He is being well-treated in the sense that he is not being beaten or kicked," she said after she and U.S. Consul General Roger Daley met Daniloff for an hour at the prison.

She said Soviet officials kept trying to get the weekly magazine correspondent to say he was a spy.

"He seems to be very calm. He is just very isolated and wants to know what is going on outside," she said.

In the first official Soviet comment on the arrest, the KGB issued a statement Sunday saying Daniloff "was detained ... as he was engaging in an act of espionage."

"The material confiscated from him fully expose the U.S. correspondent of being involved in intelligence activities," said the three-sentence statement, issued through the official Tass news agency. "An investigation is under way into Daniloff's case."

No formal charges were filed, but Daley said Soviet authorities could hold the reporter indefinitely without charges during investigation.

Daniloff is the first Western journalist held by Soviet authorities for more than a few hours at a time and the first jailed for an investigation of espionage allegations. Other Western reporters have been accused of spying but have not been held in prison cells for such a prolonged period.

The arrest comes during a Kremlin campaign to portray itself as a peace-loving and trustworthy international partner, and appeared to be in retaliation for the Aug. 23 arrest in New York of a Soviet U.N. employee on spy charges.

Daniloff, who planned to leave soon for a new assignment in Washington after 5½ years in Moscow, was arrested in a Moscow park immediately after a farewell meeting with a Soviet acquaintance.

Ruth said the acquaintance, Misha, gave Daniloff a closed package, saying it contained newspaper clippings from his hometown.

When Misha left, Daniloff was jumped by eight plainclothesmen and taken to Lefortovo. There the package was opened and two maps marked "top secret" were taken out, along with photographs of Soviet military equipment and installations.

"I consider the whole detention to be totally barbaric and unworthy of a great country like the Soviet Union," said Ruth, 51, standing in a drizzling rain outside the prison. She called the arrest a "setup."

In Washington, the State Department said Saturday that the Reagan administration has strongly protested the arrest "high levels here and in Moscow."

Under Soviet law, Daniloff has no right to a lawyer until he is formally charged. He is allowed one visit a month from his wife.

Mortimer B. Zuckerman, chairman of U.S. News & World Report, the magazine Daniloff works for, arrived in Moscow from Washington and called the reporters' jailing "a phony arrest based on contrived circumstances."

K-State head coach Stan Parrish sits alone with his thoughts prior to the game.

Parrish's prayers answered with 35-7...

VICTORY

Staff/Jim Dietz

Parrish celebrates after his defensive unit kept Western Illinois from reaching the end zone, momentarily preserving a K-State shutout of the Leathernecks. Western Illinois scored on the next play, but it didn't matter as the 'Cats gave Parrish his first victory as head coach. The Wildcats' next game will be Saturday against Texas Tech in Lubbock, Texas.

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Air Parrish may not have soared as high as many expected, but a balanced offensive attack and opportunistic Wildcat defense did more than enough damage in K-State's 35-7 rout of Western Illinois Saturday night at KSU Stadium.

While the efficient K-State passing attack accounted for 168 yards and two touchdowns, the untouted running game was good for 214.

"I've said all along since last spring that our running backs were some pretty firm people," K-State Coach Stan Parrish said. "That's important for us. If we can get some running out of them, that gives you really fine balance."

And while the anticipated aerial circus never quite materialized, quarterback Randy Williams, who completed 7 of 14 passes for 148 yards and two touchdowns in the first half before sitting out much of the second half, gave indications that he has the ability to operate effectively in a passing scheme.

"I was very proud of his effort. I know he was nervous going in," Parrish said. "That's got to be more than we can understand when people have thrown you in the scrap heap. Even our best group of supporters had reservations whether he could get it done.

"He took a big step forward. Nobody could do it for him. He had to go in and perform and make the throws and the calls. I think he knows we're all behind him 100 percent and I think that's important."

> 'I think 50-0 would have done more harm than good for our program. We would have had a tougher time facing reality on Monday.'
> — Head Coach Stan Parrish

Williams, who said he expected to make more passing attempts than he did, can't be accused of showing favoritism, either. Dan Hughes caught three passes and scored one touchdown while Todd Cowings also hauled in two passes and scored a touchdown. Four other players caught passes as well.

"I was pleased with myself, but I was also pleased with the whole receiving corps," Hughes said. "Todd Cowings, Todd Elder and everyone else that was in there did a really fine job."

Parrish said passing the ball more times would have been inappropriate under the circumstances.

"You've got to look at the game. We played our regulars two quarters and one drive. We played a quarter into the wind from the 10-yard line," he said. "We could have thrown it 50 times, but you want to choreograph it right for the kids. You don't want to throw an interception when you're ahead 7-0 with the ball on the 10-yard line.

The second half, which K-State entered with a 28-0 lead, would have presented more opportunities to pass. However, running up the score wasn't one of Parrish's priorities.

"I think 50-0 would have done more harm than good for our program," Parrish said. "We would have had a tougher time facing reality on Monday."

The Wildcat defense allowed 379 yards in total offense to Western Illinois, but forced nine turnovers.

Robert Easterwood (tying a school record) intercepted three passes and Willie Halliburton, Matt Wallerstedt and Dewayne Castille each intercepted one. K-State recovered three of five Leatherneck fumbles.

"I don't even know if they (K-State) had a sustained drive worth a damn," Western Illinois Coach Bruce Craddock said. "Against people of equal ability or better, you can't make errors like that and win."

K-State scored first on a 26-yard pass from Williams to Cowings with 12:27 left in the first quarter. The Wildcats increased their lead to 14-0 on a 6-yard run by Tony Jordan with 14:50 left in the second quarter. Maurice Henry scored from the 1 with 2:58 left before half and Hughes caught a 23-yard pass from Williams with 2:12 left to put the 'Cats up 28-0 at halftime.

Jordan's 4-yard run with 6:20 left in the third quarter gave K-State a 35-0 lead. Victor Perrin scored the lone Western Illinois touchdown on an 8-yard run with 21 seconds left in the game.

K-State will travel to Lubbock, Texas, to meet Texas Tech at 7 p.m. Saturday. The game will be the season opener for the Red Raiders, who finished 4-7 last year including a 1-8 Southwest Conference mark.

Questions get good answers in 'Cats' defensive backfield

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Going into Saturday's football game against Western Illinois, one of Stan Parrish's biggest questions concerned the experience of his defensive backfield.

After Saturday's game, Parrish discovered a big part of his answer was Robert Easterwood.

The sophomore free safety from Kansas City, Kan., said he was nervous going into his first Big Eight Conference game, but Easterwood rose to the occasion by snatching three interceptions and tying the school record in the process.

"I did something right for a change," said Easterwood whose interceptions were part of a team total of six. "Our defense is all a unit and (the interceptions) came from great help from the defensive line."

Entering the game with the Leathernecks, cornerback Brad Lambert was the veteran of the defensive backfield. He knew the coaches and the fans were worried about the experience of the secondary, but he agreed with Easterwood when he gave much of the credit for the unit's success to the defensive line.

"I think the secondary showed we can play tonight," Lambert said. "I think the up-front guys did a great job rushing. That makes it so easy because (the quarterback) throws the ball where he doesn't want to, or he hurries his throw."

Lambert made a shoe-string tackle early in the second quarter which prevented Western's speedy Albert Brown from scoring on a 76-yard run. Three plays later Easterwood intercepted his first college pass in the end zone and attempted to run the ball out with the Leathernecks' receiver in hot pursuit.

"I didn't know he had my jersey," said the smiling Easterwood. "I got excited and all I saw was a lot of green and I was going to go to it."

Easterwood only made it 9 yards before he was dragged down and he said he showed his inexperience on the play.

"We (the secondary) made a couple of mistakes, but all in all we had a great game. We'll learn from those mistakes," Easterwood said.

Besides Easterwood's three interceptions, strong safety Willie Halliburton and linebackers Dewayne Castille and Matt Walletstedt each picked off Western Illinois passes.

Following the game, Parrish said he liked what he saw in his defensive secondary.

"We didn't know how they would play. You've got to be very pleased for those kids because, I'm sure, it's a big confidence builder for them," Parrish said.

K-State safety Willie Halliburton (42) is caught by Western Illinois tackle John Wisnesky (71) after a second quarter interception. Halliburton's interception was one of six thefts by Wildcat defensive backs in the game.

Nelson earns rank of senior mentor

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the first in a series of stories featuring K-State athletic coaches. The series will appear Tuesdays on the sports page.

Scott Nelson is the grizzled veteran of the K-State coaching ranks.

The term grizzled is used loosely. Despite only being 31, the K-State volleyball coach's stint of seven years as a Wildcat mentor is four years more experience than any of his counterparts.

A rash of coaching changes at K-State has left a man who looks almost as young now as he did when he was an All-American volleyball player at Ball State University as the longest-tenured Wildcat coach.

Nelson has spent all of his coaching career at K-State and he has grown into his job.

"My first year or two, I was coming out of the players' approach to athletics and got more into developing my coaching attitude," Nelson said. "I think I did that fairly quickly and while I still compete with friends of mine, it's more of a social environment than the highly competitive training environment I was in for five or six years."

The Coaches of K-State

After completing his playing eligibility at Ball State, Nelson joined the United States national team and competed on that squad for 1½ years before deciding it was best for himself to go back and complete his undergraduate degrees.

That decision, Nelson said, turned out to be one of the wisest of his life. Within six months after Nelson returned to Ball State to finish his economics and physical education degrees, President Jimmy Carter decided the United States would boycott the 1980 Olympics in Moscow.

Nelson received his master's degree in physical education from Brigham Young University the following year and in his last days at BYU he received a phone call from former K-State athletic director Deloss Dodds. Three days after earning his master's, Nelson was at K-State as the new volleyball coach and he set out to handle the transition from player to coach.

"As a coach, I set some personal goals for improvement my first years here. I wanted to improve on my ability to recognize game flow and help control tempo," Nelson said. "As a player, you tend to be emotionally involved in a match, where as a coach, you have to really keep that emotion exterior to what you're doing."

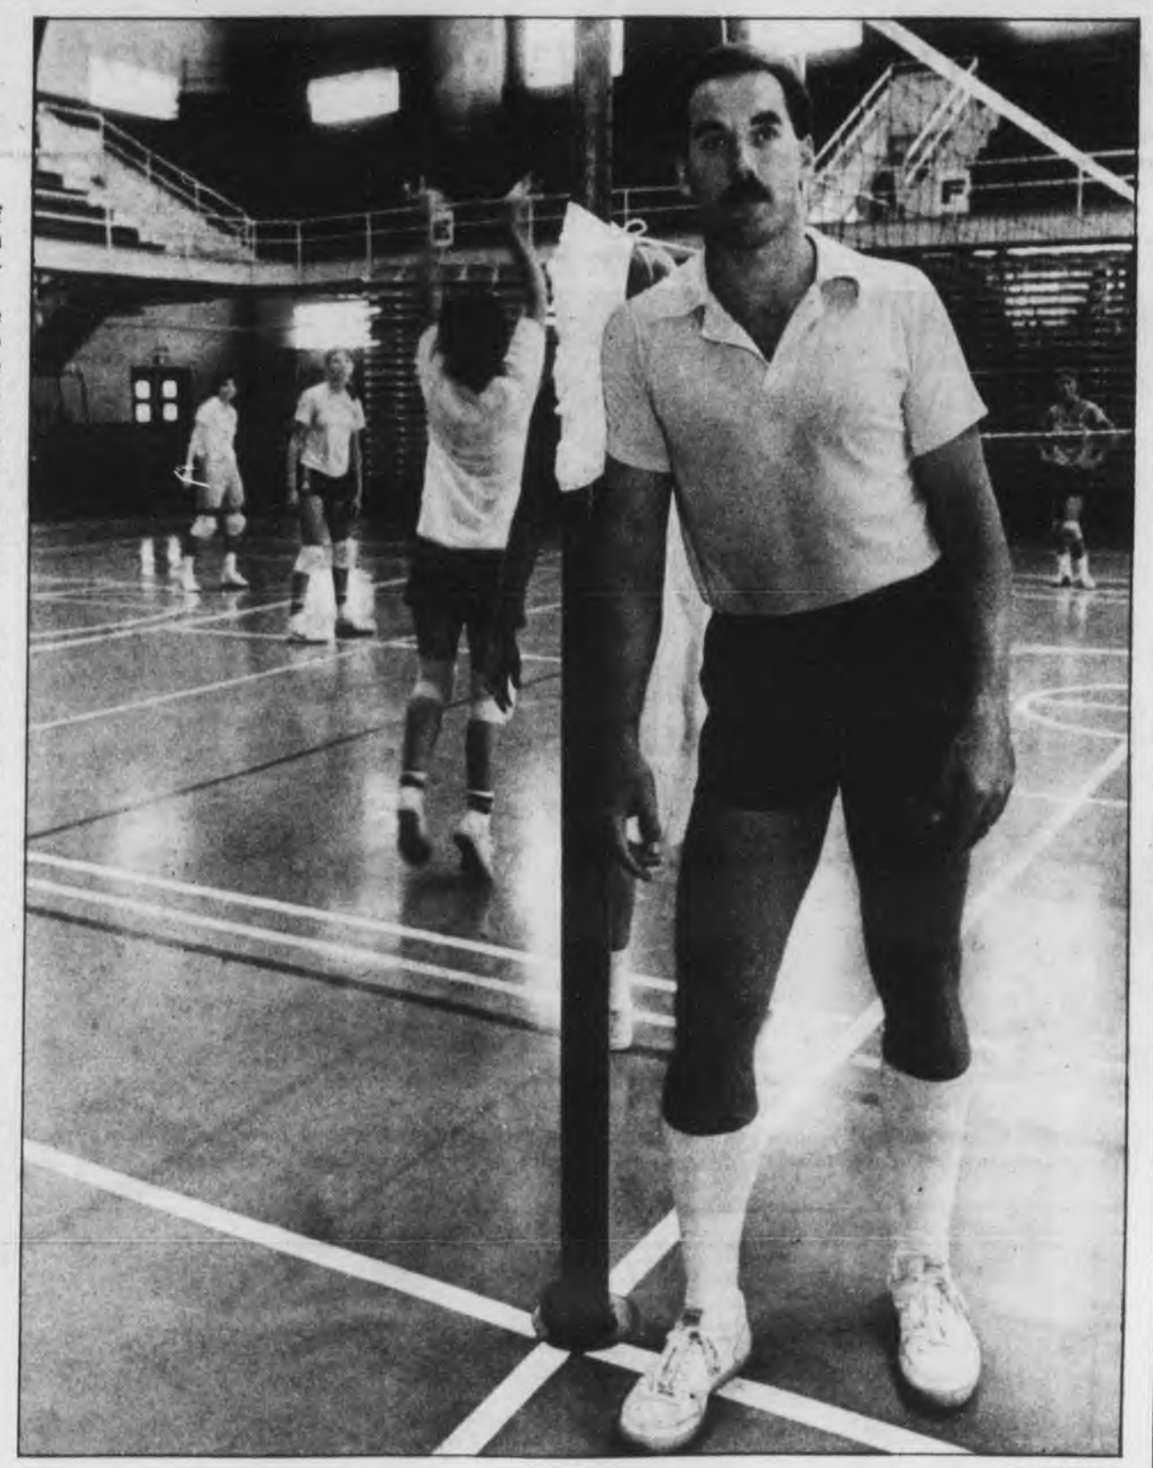
Now Nelson finds himself caught in the penny-pinching problems of Wildcat athletics, but his own creativity is helping his team remain competitive.

"There are limitations I've come across in the years. We've tried to eliminate some of those in a positive means," Nelson said. "Say, we don't have the same recruiting budget as some of the schools. What I've done is I've started a junior development program in the area.

"I've got the best high school players throughout the state training with us in the spring. It upgrades the level of recruits in this area," Nelson said.

That is a different attitude toward recruiting than Nelson brought with him to K-State.

"When I came here, I thought I'd just recruit great kids from all over the country — I was naive as a coach," Nelson said.



"I did recruit the outstanding setter at the junior college nationals (in my first years at K-State). She came and played for us, but she was from California and socially did not fit in this area (of the country)."

Now Nelson concentrates his efforts toward recruiting all-around athletes from within the area and in regions of the United States where the social environment is similar to Kansas.

Without a doubt Nelson has proved himself a talented recruiter and as the fact that he coached the North men's team at the recent Olympic Festival in Houston testifies, he is respected by his peers.

Why does a young coach who has tremendous credentials stick with a program with a limited budget? Nelson is not the type to leave before he is done with a job and he still has more goals to conquer at K-State.

"Right now we've developed into a regionally competitive team. The next step is 'can we be successful against the current nationally ranked teams?,'" Nelson said. "Yeah, I think we can be successful."

Scott Nelson, K-State volleyball coach, is the veteran of the Wildcat coaches. Nelson, a former All-American volleyball player, has the longest-tenured coaching position after spending seven years coaching volleyball.

Young coaches answer to Travis' problems

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

When Larry Travis was hired as K-State's athletic director in February 1985, he knew changes were inevitable if the Wildcat athletic department was to climb the ladder of success.

After 1½ years of leading one of the least successful athletic programs of this decade, Travis seemingly has spent every passing moment of those 18 months making changes.

Only three head coaches remain who were hired by Travis' predecessor Dick Towers. And, more amazingly, every coach of a Wildcat men's squad has been hired by Travis.

"It just worked out that way," Travis said. "I think we're in great shape with our programs. I'm very pleased with the character and work ethic of all of our coaches. They're very good people and they believe in what we're doing."

Not by Travis' design, the man whom Travis hired only last December to lead the K-State football program — Stan Parrish — is the elder statesman of the Wildcat men's coaches.

A firing, two retirements, one move into administration and another opting to go to another school have left Travis with one of the youngest coaching crews in college athletics.

"I think intercollegiate athletics is getting to the point where young, enthusiastic people are (at an advantage)" Travis said.

It's that same youthful enthusiasm which impressed Travis into bringing Parrish, men's basketball coach Lon Kruger, golf coach Rob Sedorcek, track and cross country coach John Capriotti and baseball coach Mike Clark to K-State.

"None of these people ever talk about being average. They talk about winning," Travis said.

All of the hirings make the longest-tenured member of the department's coaching staff volleyball coach Scott Nelson — a man who looks years away from his first gray hair. (See related story.)

And Travis is expecting victories from his "kid" coaches of K-State.

"We want to win. We want our teams to be well prepared, well coached, strategically sound and the (athletes) to be treated fairly," he added.

Travis remains excited about being the "Pied Piper" of Wildcat athletics, but when he came to K-State he had no idea the ladder of success would have so many rungs on it.

Those extra steps don't faze Travis who tries not to dwell on the negative, but who handles adversity with a smile and a "full steam ahead" attitude.

"There are no problems," he said. "There are only opportunities and let me tell you, last year, the good Lord gave me a lot of opportunities."

NFL teams cut rosters; Bo's in KC

By The Associated Press

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Quarterback Lynn Dickey and tight end Paul Coffman, a longtime Green Bay passing combination, were released Monday by the Packers.

Dickey and Coffman, both former K-Staters, were among four cuts announced Monday by the Packers. Dickey was given his release earlier in the year when contract negotiations with the Packers broke down. But he and Coffman, a holdout, rejoined the team on July 29.

With Dickey gone, the Packers have third-year pro Randy Wright as their No. 1 quarterback, with former Los Angeles Rams quarterback Vince Ferragamo as backup. Robbie Bosco, a rookie out of Brigham Young, is on the injured reserve list with tendinitis in his shoulder.

Green Bay finished the exhibition season at 1-3. Dickey, 37, completed 22 of 43 passes for 247 yards. He had one touchdown toss and threw one interception.

Coffman, 30, a three-time Pro Bowl player who had elbow surgery after his return to training camp, did not play in any of the preseason games.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Running back Ethan Horton, the No. 1 draft choice of the Kansas City Chiefs last season, was among five players cut Monday as the team reduced its roster to the National Football League's regular season limit of 45.

The Chiefs also cut linebacker Calvin Daniels, a fifth-year veteran — like Horton, from North Carolina — who started every game the last two seasons. Others released were defensive lineman Gary Baldinger, wide receiver Emile Harry and defensive back Lupe Sanchez.

The Chiefs had been hoping for Horton to come into his own this year but he had a lackluster exhibition season.

Former Kansas University star Frank Seurer made the team as the No. 3 quarterback behind starter Todd Blackledge and backup Bill Kenney. Seurer played two seasons with the USFL's Los Angeles Express, then was cut by the Seattle Seahawks last year in his first try at the NFL.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bo Jackson officially became a major leaguer Monday, saying he's "ecstatic" with his baseball progress and tired of talking about football.

After a slow start, the right-handed hitter batted .277 with seven home runs and 25 runs batted in in 53 games at Class AA Memphis of the Southern League.

Jackson has been nursing a pulled hamstring muscle but team physician Dr. Paul Meyer said after an examination Sunday that he was "in good shape."

Jackson said he had no idea when he would be ready to play.

Royals interim Manager Mike Ferraro said he would put Jackson into the lineup "as soon as he tells me he's ready."

Steam engine puffs its way into depot

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Reminiscences of a fading American institution were present Friday morning at Manhattan's Depot as Union Pacific No. 8444 stopped in town on its statewide trek to commemorate Kansas' 125th birthday.

The train was selected to celebrate the state's birthday because many of the lifestyles and economies that developed in Kansas in the late 1800s evolved around the railroads, said Rick Mann, Manhattan mayor.

Engine No. 8444 was the last steam locomotive built for the company, he said.

The engine, which pulled such famous trains as the Overland Limited and the Portland Rose, was saved for special excursions in 1960. It served as Union Pacific's ambassador to numerous civic celebrations, including Expo '74 in Spokane, Wash., and the 1984 World's Fair in New Orleans.

The 12-car train, carrying about 150 invited passengers and staff members, left Denver Aug. 27, and made stops in Limon, Colo., Oakley, Russell and Salina.

Invited passengers included media representatives, rail shippers and elected officials, said John Bromley, Omaha, Neb., media and public relations manager for Union Pacific.

Bromley said the train, which is powered by heavy diesel fuel and weighs 454 tons, travels about 48 mph.

"Our tender holds 23,600 gallons of water," he said, "which will take us about 100 miles. Then we have to replenish the water."

The locomotive, which sported both a Kansas and an American flag and pulled yellow and gray passenger cars with red trim, was on display in Topeka during Labor Day weekend and leaves today for Cheyenne, Wyo., where it will be stored.

After its 20-minute appearance, No. 8444 rumbled eastward at noon shrouded in a cloud of dark smoke.

Union Pacific Engine No. 8444 prepares to leave Manhattan Friday morning after a short stop on its way to Topeka. The train is being used to help commemorate the 125th anniversary of Kansas' statehood.

'Gross' special effects detract from 'The Fly'

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Imagine this: ears falling off, fingernails peeling back, skin becoming puss-filled and bloated. Sounds like a good time? Well, these are some of the sights to behold in director David Cronenberg's remake of the 1958 Vincent Price movie "The Fly."

Film Review

But underneath all these gross-out special effects, (for those people who have the stomach to keep their eyes open long enough to follow what's happening on the screen) "The Fly" contains one of the most convincing love stories to come along in years.

Typically, love interest in sci-fi movies is only obligatory and never believable, but in "The Fly" director/co-writer Cronenberg has fashioned a love story central to the movie's plot. It involves a scientist, Seth Brundle (played by Jeff Goldblum in the performance of his career), and Veronica Quaife (Geena Davis, in an equally effective performance). Brundle is a recluse, only living for his work, until he meets Veronica. And then, as she begins showing him the importance of human relationships, he begins allowing her to document his work on a matter transfer experiment.

Everybody is probably familiar with the next step in the story: While trying the experiment out on himself, Brundle unknowingly allows a fly into the same matter transfer pod he is in. The results? Brundlefly. Only this time that doesn't simply mean Brundle gets the head of a fly and the fly the head of a human, as in the 1958 version. This time the fly's genes are spliced with Brundle's. He emerges looking the same, but over the next several weeks a change will slowly take place.

At first Brundle doesn't realize what has happened. He feels invigorated. He can do acrobatics like an Olympic gymnast. His sexual appetite becomes insatiable. But he's not the same person, and soon afterward strange coarse hairs start sprouting from his back.

But even with all that the movie has going for it, I'm not sure I can whole-heartedly recommend it. The gross-out special effects seem to deaden the drama at times. I kept wanting to look away from the screen, particularly when Brundlefly spits out formic acid to digest his food. That's about as disgusting as anything I've ever seen on film.

Cronenberg would've done better just suggesting some of the special effects instead of showing them to us in close-ups. Their cumulative effect detracts from the drama itself and sent me out of the theater repulsed by what I had seen. But somewhere, underneath all the rotting flesh and broken teeth, there is a fascinating love story taking place. To find it, we just need ironclad stomachs.

HOW CAN THE BUDGET-CONSCIOUS COLLEGE STUDENT SAVE MONEY?

a) Save over 50% off AT&T's weekday rates on out-of-state calls during nights and weekends.

b) Don't buy textbooks when "Monarch Notes" will do just fine.

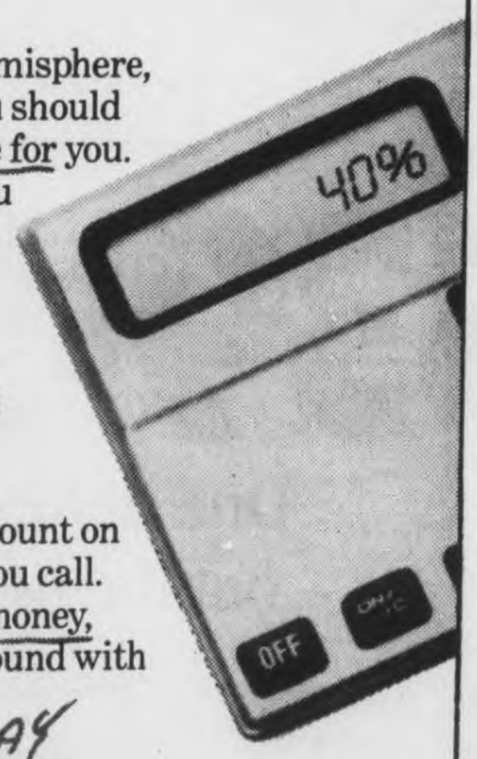
c) Save 40% off AT&T's weekday rate on out-of-state calls during evenings.

d) Count on AT&T for exceptional value and high quality service.

e) Hang around with the richest kids in school; let them pick up the tab whenever possible.

If you're like most college students in the western hemisphere, you try to make your money go a long way. That's why you should know that AT&T Long Distance Service is the right choice for you.

AT&T offers so many terrific values. For example, you can save over 50% off AT&T's day rate on calls during weekends until 5 pm Sunday, and from 11 pm to 8 am, Sunday through Friday.



GREAT DEAL!

Call between 5 pm and 11 pm, Sunday through Friday, and you'll save 40% off our day rate.

Ever dial a wrong number? AT&T gives you immediate credit if you do. And of course, you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections any place you call.

To find out more about how AT&T can help save you money, give us a call. With a little luck, you won't have to hang around with the rich kids. Call toll-free today, at 1 800 222-0300

Zoo raises money for monkey exhibit

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Sunset Zoo has been up to some monkey business.

"The Great Ape Escape," a fund-raising campaign initiated last spring to raise money for a new outdoor chimpanzee exhibit, has currently raised between $31,000 and $32,000, said Don Wixom, curator of education at Sunset Zoo.

But an additional $2,000 to $4,000 is needed in order to begin fall construction on the exhibit, which should cost between $34,000 and $36,000, he said.

Wixom said the chimps, housed in the E.J. Frick Primate Building, are currently in an overcrowded situation.

"Our chimps have been in the building since 1981 when it was opened," he said. "An outside setting would help stimulate their behavior."

The new exhibit will be an attachment to the present primate building, with a cage-like appearance on the outside and grass and play equipment on the inside.

"We want to make it as natural as we can," Wixom said. "We want to get the chimps off the concrete and put them on grass."

Not only would the exhibit help the animals, but it would create a new and exciting display for the public as well, he added.

Something else that created excitement at the zoo was the birth of a chimpanzee July 23.

Wixom called the event a "milestone" for the zoo, because the chimp is the first to be raised solely by its mother with no staff intervention.

Named E.J. after the building in which it was born, the baby is one of about 1,200 chimps in the United States today, Wixom said.

Only 300 of those chimps are in zoos, while the other 900 are used in labs for research, he said.

The major contributors to "The Great Ape Escape" were Pizza Hut and Pepsi, whose cup-selling campaign raised $2,500; the Manhattan Homebuilders Association, which donated $3,000; and the Margaret Deckert estate, which gave approximately $20,000.

Because funding was still short, Wixom said, the zoo went back to Pizza Hut and Pepsi for more help.

"Until Sunday, Pizza Hut will donate 25 cents to the fund whenever anyone buys a large Pepsi," he said. "We're trying to raise another $1,000 this way."

Wixom was pleased with the support they have had. "The zoo is a good investment for the community," he said.

Wixom said if enough funds are raised, the architectural firm, Bruce McMillan and Associates, 1006 Poyntz Ave., may begin work this fall, with the exhibit opening next spring.

Earthquake kills one; city calm afterward

By The Associated Press

KISHINEV, U.S.S.R. — Work crews cleaned up Monday after an earthquake that officials said killed one person, injured hundreds and damaged 2,300 buildings. The city was calm, and children went off to the first day of school.

Cars and vans with loudspeakers patrolled major streets of Kishinev, which has a population of 640,000 and is the capital of Moldavia. They advised residents that everything was under control after Sunday's quake.

Izvestia, the Soviet government newspaper, quoted Deputy Mayor Vladimir Tkachenko as saying 20 percent of the damaged buildings would be repaired and restored to use. He said nothing of the other buildings, but his comment implied they would be razed.

Damage to most buildings in the center of the city appeared minor. Broken windows and cracked masonry were visible in some.

The roof collapsed at a five-story granite structure housing three Moldavian government ministries, and cornices and eaves were broken. The foundation of a 15-story tower under construction appeared to have been undermined.

Toppled window displays along Lenin Avenue, Kishinev's main street, were being righted by shop clerks. Trucks loaded with debris from damaged buildings traversed the city.

Izvestia said most of the buildings damaged were old. It added that at least one built to resist earthquakes, a dormitory for workers' families, was "deformed" by the temblor.

The earthquake hit Romania and neighboring Moldavia, a small republic in the southwest corner of the Soviet Union, at 1:28 a.m. Sunday. It registered 6.5 on the Richter scale at its epicenter about 120 miles west of Kishinev.

A quake measuring 6 on the scale is regarded as capable of causing severe damage.

When the quake struck, people rushed from their houses despite a heavy thunderstorm. Izvestia described the reaction as natural but added that there were "some difficulties" and people had to be calmed.

Streets were full of children and their parents Monday, the first day of the school year throughout the Soviet Union.

Crash

Kirkpatrick said the pilot's name was William Kramer, his wife's name was Kathleen Kramer, and the daughter's name was Caroline Kramer.

Gold said a positive identification of the pilot had not been made.

"Until we positively know, we can't say," Gold said, adding that an identification may be made Tuesday after a fingerprint check.

In addition to the dead, Red Cross spokesman Stan Schwartz said 15 people were listed as missing Monday night.

Sixteen houses burned, 10 of them destroyed by flames, falling wreckage or both. Minor injuries were suffered by 10 neighborhood residents, five firefighters and a deputy.

Gov. George Deukmejian toured the neighborhood, designated a local disaster area by officials, for bout 45 minutes Monday. He said he would consider designating the neighborhood a state disaster area, if local officials ask.

"There's no confirmed (dead) on the ground," Greg Colvett of the coroner's office said at a command post in Cerritos, 20 miles southeast of Los Angeles. "It's just too much of a mess."

Lauber, speaking at a news conference, said the light plane had a transponder, a device that could broadcast its position, but "we don't know if the transponder was in fact working."

He said controllers could have detected transponder signals given off by the small plane, but "it seems unlikely they knew either the position or the altitude of the small plane."

"Whether or not the controllers saw it ... that's a question," Lauber said.

Lauber said paint scrapes found on the Aeromexico DC-9's horizontal stabilizer "seem to match at this point the paint scheme used on the smaller aircraft."

Asked if that indicated the smaller plane collided with the rear of the jet, Lauber said, "That looks like it might be a reasonable interpretation."

be known for some time.

In a project that does not concern people directly, the institute's infrared imaging device is being used by the Army Corps of Engineers at Fort Riley to study energy conservation and consumption by some of the buildings on the fort, Jones said.

The engineers are using the device to compare energy use in different buildings, he said. They are making images of newer and older buildings to determine which buildings are wasting energy.

Ship

along the coast reported hearing an SOS from the Admiral Nakhimov.

All the monitors said they could pick up Novorossiysk, about 60 miles southeast of the Crimean Peninsula.

The official in Novorossiysk, who did not give his name, also refused to say how many people were aboard the Admiral Nakhimov or how many people were killed.

He said the rescue operation continued at 7 p.m. Moscow time, involving "many" men and ships, but he would not be more specific.

A shipping official in Odessa, the liner's home port, also said by telephone that rescue work continued. He would not discuss the accident and hung up when asked how many lives were lost.

Tass said a government commission was appointed to investigate the collision and sinking, headed by First Deputy Premier Geidar A. Aliev, a member of the party's ruling Politburo. Choice of Aliev as commission chairman indicated the seriousness of the accident.

He also led the state commission that investigated the crash of a Volga river cruise ship in June 1983, in which unconfirmed reports said more than 200 people perished.

On Feb. 16, the Soviet cruise ship Mikhail Lermontov struck a reef off the coast of New Zealand and sank. Reports at the time said 792 passengers and crew were rescued and the only death was of a crew member.

Soviet officials blamed the accident on a New Zealander acting as pilot, but the government newspaper Izvestia reported last Saturday that the Mikhail Lermontov's captain was fired.

Izvestia said the senior navigator was convicted on charges it did not specify, given a four-year suspended prison sentence and fined the equivalent of $30,000.

which killed Americans.

In the face of U.S. warnings of a new, more extensive strike if Libya were found to be plotting terrorist acts, Gadhafi said Libyans would fight, "men and women in every street in every trench, if American forces come to our shores."

Stressing Libya's shared interests with the Soviet Union, Gadhafi declared, "We are fighting the same battle. We are fighting for the same goal."

He contrasted Gorbachev with Reagan, calling Gorbachev "responsible" and Reagan "crazy" and unfit to be in charge of a superpower.

Four Libyan air force MiGs swooped overhead as Gadhafi drove away in a red Cadillac convertible, surrounded by bodyguards.

$13,825 worth of jewelry taken from parked vehicle

Between Aug. 11 and Aug. 12, 1986, unidentified person or persons entered a 1980 Ford LTD, silver in color, while it was parked on Sixth Street in the vicinity of Osage Street.

While in the vehicle, suspects opened a small suitcase and stole a brown plastic medicine bottle. Inside the medicine bottle were several pieces of jewelry.

The jewelry items stolen consisted of one size 7-8 gold ring containing 19 diamonds with an open-close snap; one gold band ring with large diamond in the center; one gold chain necklace "heart shaped" with nine diamonds; one necklace with gold nugget pendant with three diamonds; two dangling style earrings with total of 17 diamonds; additionally, four other sets of earrings were taken.

Total value of items stolen is $13,825.

Persons having information on this or any crime are asked to call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers, who may call collect, need not identify themselves and may receive a cash reward of up to $1,000.

Occupancy drops in residence halls

By ROGER MCKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

The number of students in K-State residence halls declined by 75 from last year, but it is not considered a drastic drop, said Robert Felde, assistant director of the Department of Housing.

"This is an encouraging sign when you consider the factors that have promoted this slight decline," Felde said.

The housing department's early figures indicate that 3,500 students will live in the residence halls after contract confirmations have been completed.

"I believe that our upperclassmen and returning population is up from years past, which means we are doing something right," Felde said.

Housing department officials said the decline is out of the freshman class. The University no longer has a proprietary rule that requires freshmen to live on campus, but there are committees looking into reinstating the rule, he said.

"This rule has probably affected the number of students in the housing and greek systems," Felde said.

Felde said other factors also encouraged the decline in residents.

"The decrease in the total University enrollment and the tremendous proliferation of apartments in the community mean competition in our business," he said.

The cost of living in the residence halls is $1,010 per semester for a two-semester contract. Individual rooms with telephones have an additional $40 fee. This compares with the 1985 price of $990, or an increase of 2 percent.

"Comparing figures with other universities is like comparing apples with oranges, but K-State is clearly one of the most competitive residence halls, of comparable schools, in the nation," Felde said.

There are many areas the housing department has promoted to improve the environment and better meet the students' needs, he said.

"We have intensive-study floors in virtually every hall," Felde said. "This is where the residents agree to live under certain conditions which encourage a healthy atmosphere to study.

"We are also continuing the academic-cluster floors, where people request to live together based on their academic majors. As of now there are three clusters comprising of agriculture, business and engineering

Radioactive trainload travels state unnoticed

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A second trainload of spent radioactive fuel and debris from the crippled Three Mile Island nuclear power plant made its way across Kansas late Tuesday without a hint of protest or trouble, state officials said.

Col. Bert Cantwell, superintendent of the Kansas Highway Patrol, confirmed the train had entered the state on Tuesday afternoon. Leon Mannell, administrator of radiological systems for the emergency preparedness office, said federal regulation prohibited him from discussing the train's movements.

"That's classified information," Mannell said when reached at his post in the adjutant general's office. "I can neither confirm nor deny any report until after the fact."

The four-car train carried the second shipment of spent radioactive fuel and metal debris from the crippled power plant near Harrisburg, Pa., to cross the state on its way to an Idaho test site. The first of a possible 40 shipments scheduled in the next 30 months made its way across the country on July 22-23.

The train rolled through Kansas City, Lawrence, Topeka, Marysville and Hanover as it headed for the Nebraska state line on the midway point of its journey. It was expected to take about four hours to cross a 150-mile stretch along the northeast corner of the Sunflower State.

"Everything is rolling smooth across the nation," Mannell said. "Interest in the train seems to have died down. The shipments are becoming routine."

The radioactive payload is headed for the National Engineering Laboratory about 50 miles from Idaho Falls, Idaho, where it will be tested and stored. The spent fuel and debris came from TMI Unit 2 which overheated and began to melt during a

Soviets say 400 feared lost at sea

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — A tourist-packed Soviet cruise ship, rammed and torn open by a freighter, sank so fast that there was no time to deploy lifeboats and almost 400 people are feared dead, a maritime official said Tuesday.

The same vessel, then under a Red Cross flag, sank during World War II after striking a mine.

Deputy Merchant Marine Minister Leonid P. Nedyak told a news conference that rescue boats plucked 836 survivors from the Black Sea, most of them clinging to rafts that floated free when the liner Admiral Nakhimov plunged to the bottom at about midnight Sunday.

There were 1,234 people aboard, according to official reports.

Nedyak said 79 bodies were recovered and that 319 people were still missing two days after the collision.

"I hope and all of us hope that out of the 319 missing persons there may be some survivors," Nedyak said. But he added: "I believe that most of these passengers are still aboard the ship. Until the divers do their work it will be difficult to confirm this supposition."

He said the vessel rests on the bottom at a depth of 155 feet.

Nedyak said the information he had indicated no bodies had been recovered since late Monday. He said 29 of the survivors were hospitalized, but he did not give their conditions.

He said the liner was rammed amidships on its starboard at 11:15 p.m. Sunday by the Soviet freighter Pyotr Vasyev. The collision occurred about nine miles from the port of Novorossiysk.

Nedyak said officials believe the cruise ship sank within 15 minutes.

"The blow came into the partition between the engine room and the boiler room and, practically speaking, it ripped the ship open," Nedyak said.

"From the moment of the blow until the moment of the sinking of the ship, it was not possible to launch into water any of the rescue boats," he said.

Nedyak said it was too soon to assign blame. He said there was no fog at the time of the collision.

He said about 50 vessels were continuing search and rescue operations, along with helicopters and other aircraft.

There were no casualties among the crew of the freighter, which was laden with grain,

Castro castigates U.S. at meeting of non-aligned countries

By The Associated Press

HARARE, Zimbabwe — Cuban President Fidel Castro on Tuesday accused the United States of defying the world by supporting anti-Marxist rebels in Nicaragua, as tempers flared at the summit meeting of nations professing non-alignment.

Earlier, leaders of the 101-member movement listened in embarrassed silence while Iran demanded the expulsion of fellow member Iraq and accused its enemy of war crimes surpassing those of the Nazis and Genghis Khan.

Outside the conference hall, Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi's security guards, trying to crowd in with him, clashed with Zimbabwean security officers and were driven off, witnesses reported.

"The Zimbabweans and Libyans literally got into a scrimmage," said one diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Inside the flag-bedecked hall, the leaders pressed on into a late-night session on the second day of their weeklong summit. Castro led a series of attacks on the United States that included angry speeches by Nicaragua and Iran.

Zambia's president, Kenneth Kaunda, broke into tears over another major issue at the summit — apartheid in neighboring South Africa.

"Thousands have been killed in cold blood and thousands more imprisoned" since the white government declared a state of emergency on June 12, Kaunda said, wiping his eyes with a white handkerchief.

Castro described a $100 million U.S. aid package to Nicaraguan rebels as an "open and shameless slap in the face for the peoples of Latin America and the world."

The package won final congressional approval in August, and military and logistical aid to the Contras is expected to start flowing this month.

Nicaragua's foreign minister, Miguel D'Escoto, vowed later his country would never bow to U.S. attempts "to make us a backyard state."

Castro pledged that Cuba would keep troops in Marxist Angola "so long as there is apartheid in South Africa."

Cuba has stationed about 25,000 soldiers in Angola for 10 years. South Africa says that free, pre-independence elections cannot take place in South-West Africa, also called Namibia, until the Cubans leave.

Angola is the base for guerrillas fighting to end South African control of Namibia.

National television broadcasts of summit proceedings were abruptly suspended as President Ali Khamenei of Iran brushed aside appeals for peace talks in Iran's six-year-old Persian Gulf war with Iraq.

Holton allocation funds lay idle

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

Although the money is available and plans have been discussed, no renovation of Holton Hall has begun, said Barb Robel, director of Greek Affairs whose office is in Holton.

Last February, $183,000 out of an available $700,000 was allocated by Student Senate for a two-phase renovation of Holton Hall.

"Personally, I hope they renovate it and do some aesthetic kinds of things," Robel said. She said renovations of the building would make it more attractive to new students and parents and easier to locate offices there.

Also allocated was $86,000 to the KSU Child Care Cooperative. The cooperative, which services children of faculty, staff and students, has used its portion of the allocation for expansion.

"In 1984 (former) President Duane Acker assigned a task force to look into the need for child care at K-State," said Nancy Bolsen, director of the cooperative. "At that time it was determined that approximately 240 children were in need of care."

The capacity of the cooperative is expected to increase from 50 to 223 children if a new child care license is approved.

"In time we will ask for a licensed capacity of 223. That's what the true capacity of our center would be," Bolsen said.

The debate and judging teams received $80,000 and $60,000, respectively, to create endowments for the teams, according to information provided by the Student Governing Association. Ten percent interest is drawn yearly from these endowments, creating $8,000 for debate and $6,000 for judging. The teams may use funds drawn from the interest received, but the original sum of the endowments may not be drawn from the account.

KSDB, the campus FM radio station, received $23,600 to purchase equipment to utilize its newly acquired broadcast tower, donated by KAKE-TV in Wichita, said Lee Buller, associate professor of journalism and mass communications and KSDB adviser.

While the call letters of the station will not change, the dial position will move from 88.1 to 91.9 upon approval of the Federal Communications Commission.

City commission rezones 10 acres for construction of 2nd Wal-Mart

By The Collegian Staff

Manhattan City Commission rezoned 10 acres of land from residential to commercial to allow Wal-Mart to build a free-standing building on Seth Child's Road Tuesday.

The commission passed the measure with several stipulations attached. Commissioners decided that the frontage road adjacent to Seth Child's Road must be completed before Wal-Mart will be allowed to open.

Another condition was the installation of a traffic signal at Seth Child's Road and Shuss Road to control any increased traffic flow the store would create.

The commission also requested a recommendation from Urban Planning Board on the development of the area.

Commissioners also decided they would not issue construction permits for the Wal-Mart building until bids for the Seth Child's Road improvement have been let.

The commission passed the measure 4-1, with Commissioner Dave Fiser dissenting.

"It (Wal-Mart) isn't in the proper place and would affect neighborhood character," Fiser said.

Fiser also said he was concerned about decreasing property values and that the project would not be consistent with what the commission has been trying to achieve in routing Seth Child's Road.

In other business, city commissioners approved a measure authorizing B G Consultants to finish designs for the Seth Child's Road project, although the city does not now have the funds to complete the project.

The commission authorized the issuance of $238,852 in temporarary notes to finance the engineering services.

Fiser said he supported approving the ordinance as scheduled even though past requests for state funding have been turned down.

Mayor Rick Mann supported the ordinance but said every effort should be made to gain alternative funding to reduce the tax burden.

Commissioner Gene Klingler said the commission may be "putting the cart before the horse."

Estimated cost of the Seth Child's Road project is $5.4 million. The projected completion date is spring 1988.

Hostages live with threat of death

BEIRUT, Lebanon — French hostages live with "the specter of death," one of them said on a tape delivered Tuesday with a statement from their captors accusing Washington of blocking a deal with France to free them.

Islamic Jihad, the extremist Shiite Moslem group that holds both French and American kidnap victims, renewed its demand that two Iraqi Shiites deported to Baghdad by the French government last February be returned to Paris.

If that is not done, the statement said, Islamic Jihad will "bear no responsibility for any negative act that would affect the lives of the hostages." The typewritten statement in Arabic and 5-minute videotape were delivered to the Beirut office of a Western television network.

Dole appeals for journalist's release

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole appealed Tuesday to Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev for the "immediate and unconditional release" of American journalist Nicholas Daniloff from a KGB prison.

Dole, R-Kan., said in a statement that "if developments in Moscow continue on the present course, then I can guarantee the Senate will be voting on a resolution expressing its outrage over the cruel harassment of the free American press."

Daniloff, the Moscow correspondent for U.S. News & World Report magazine, has been held by the KGB on espionage charges since Saturday.

In a telegram to Gorbachev, Dole said he was "deeply disturbed by the wholly unjustified detention" of Daniloff.

Sculptor Henry Moore dies at 88

LONDON — Henry Moore, widely regarded as the greatest sculptor of his time, will be buried Thursday in a private ceremony near his village home, it was announced Tuesday.

Moore, 88, died Sunday.

David Mitchinson, keeper of the Henry Moore Foundation which channeled much of the sculptor's wealth to young artists, said Moore's widow wanted the Anglican service to be "strictly private."

He said a memorial service for the public was expected to take place at Westminster Abbey in London later in the year.

Controllers face drug investigation

PALMDALE, Calif. — Three of 34 air traffic controllers under investigation for illicit drug use have used marijuana, amphetamines or cocaine, a Federal Aviation Administration spokesman said Tuesday.

Fifteen of the 34 were found in tests to have used no drugs and have been returned to their duties controlling air traffic from Bakersfield to the Mexican border and into Utah and Nevada, said Don Early, manager of the Los Angeles Enroute Air Traffic Control Center here.

He didn't specify whether the three controllers used any drugs while on the job.

The 34 controllers and five administrative workers were reassigned to desk jobs last month after the agency said it was looking into allegations they had used cocaine and hashish at a private party.

At a news conference, Early said 16 controllers remain under investigation, but that that was not a reflection on their guilt or innocence.

He said the employees who tested positive for drugs will have an opportunity to go through rehabilitation or face dismissal.

Inventory turns up missing items

TOPEKA — Somebody took a sewing machine and a painting from Cedar Crest, the governor's mansion, and Gov. John Carlin's former wife, Karen, has been questioned about the disappearances.

An inventory of the mansion, taken after Carlin and his second wife were divorced in June 1985, turned up two missing items: a sewing machine valued at $309.98 and a painting by Charles Rogers of Ellsworth entitled Autumn Scene which had a $165 pricetag.

Alden Shields, secretary of administration, said Tuesday the governor's attorney contacted his former wife's attorney to inquire about the problem. However, Karen Carlin said through her legal counsel she had no knowledge of their whereabouts.

"We have no idea where these two items are and we're not too excited about it," Shields said. "Items disappear in public agencies and in private businesses. Inventories shrink. Who knows why. It's no big deal."

Karen Carlin moved to Wichita with her two children after the governor brought an end to their tumultuous four-year marriage by seeking an emergency divorce in Johnson County District Court. It was the second marriage for both.

U.S. asks Libyans to remove Gadhafi

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration, stepping up its war of nerves with Moammar Gadhafi, advised the Libyan people Tuesday to consider the country's isolation and shaky economy, and decide whether he should remain in power.

While not calling directly for Gadhafi's ouster, the State Department said "it's abundantly clear the Libyan economy has been mismanaged and that Libyan actions have increasingly isolated the Libyan people from the international community."

Spokesman Charles E. Redman, after reading the prepared statement, said "it's up to the Libyan people to decide" Gadhafi's future. "I'm doing nothing more than pointing out some of the reasons on which they might make their decision," he said.

In Cincinnati, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said the United States is not trying to provoke Gadhafi by engaging in military exercises in the Mediterranean.

At a news conference in connection with his appearance before a convention of the American Legion, Weinberger, asked about U.S. intentions, said, " ... In the first place, you don't have to provoke Gadhafi. He's always provoked. But nobody's trying to do that."

Redman's statement followed a report in The Wall Street Journal that the Central Intelligence Agency had intensified its covert efforts to unseat Gadhafi, who is accused by the United States of promoting terrorism.

American warplanes bombed Tripoli and Benghazi, the two main Libyan cities, in mid-April in what the administration described as retaliation for state-sponsored terrorism against Americans.

Weinberger told reporters, "I have to say we haven't had any incidents of major terrorism" since the air strikes.

The Journal said the CIA, under a plan approved last month by President Reagan, was increasing support to Gadhafi's internal enemies and trying to unify some of the splintered Libyan opposition groups.

Redman said he could not discuss "alleged intelligence activities."He also declined to say whether Gadhafi appeared to be "on a slope of one sort or another."

Gadhafi, in a speech Monday, called President Reagan a "madman" and threatened to form an international army to "fight America everywhere."

Redman said he would not "dignify" the speech with a formal response. But the U.S. official went on to say that "we reserve the right to respond to any act of state-sponsored terrorism against the United States in a manner we deem most appropriate."

Arriving Tuesday in Zimbabwe for the non-aligned summit, the Libyan leader vowed to do his utmost to divide the world into two factions, "the liberation camp and the imperialist camp."

Weather slows Weber Hall renovation

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Although the weather has had an adverse effect on meeting some completion dates for Weber Hall, the renovation is underway and proceeding as planned, said Melvin Hunt, professor of animal sciences and industry.

"Very good progress has been made on renovation of the old building," he said. "In fact, the renovation is a little ahead of schedule."

However, construction of the facility's addition is somewhat behind schedule, he said.

"The main reason has been the rainy and damp weather, which has hindered the earthmoving process," Hunt said.

Although the Weber project is still on track, the original completion target date of August 1987, may not be met.

"We (the department) hope to be in the building for classes starting in the fall of 1987," he said.

The cost of Weber renovation is $7.2 million. This figure is the same as originally submitted and has not been increased or decreased since the project started, Hunt said. The Livestock and Meat Industry Council is planning to raise $500,000 to buy the moveable equipment needed for classroom teaching, meat processing and research.

"The purpose of renovation of the existing space and addition of new space is to improve the quality of space and the capacity to teach and do research," said Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture.

Woods said there are basically three reasons for the renovation and addition.

"It was evident that the animal science facilities needed renovation and expansion," he said.

Secondly, the livestock industry in Kansas is a vital business, and meat processing is an important component of this industry, Woods said. He cited the need to better serve the livestock industry in teaching and research as a reason for expanding.

"Research and transfer of technology lead to continued development in the livesock industry," he said. "Thus, this project can be looked upon as an investment in the future of Kansas agriculture."

The addition, Hunt said, will be a two-story structure containing 23,000 square feet of new, usable space.

"The first floor will contain the meat processing facilities and a couple of classrooms," he said.

Research laboratories in meat science, analytical procedures, monogastric nutrition and microbiology will be located on the second floor.

"The exciting part is that the classrooms are designed to do what the faculty in the department want to do with them, from teaching feeds and feeding to muscle and meat," Hunt said.

A new meats laboratory furnished with modern equipment also is planned, as well as new research laboratories that never existed in the old building, he said.

"The student can look forward to many new additions," Hunt said, mentioning the new library and student commissary complex.

A controlled atmosphere in the classroom and exposure to audio-visual equipment and computers as teaching tools are other advantages for the student, Hunt said.

While the renovation is taking place, Weber has been vacated except for the use of the arena, he said. Staff members have been relocated to Call and Moore halls.

When the project is finished, a superficial face-lift will be given the offices, and a change will be found in the size and number of classrooms. New animal physiology laboratories, new graduate offices and a few faculty offices also will be added, he said.

Senior earns conservation award

Richard C. Rowan, senior in natural resource management, was one of 18 college and university students to receive a $500 scholarship in conservation for the 1986-87 school year.

The scholarship was awarded by the Soil Conservation Society of America to encourage qualified junior and senior college students to complete their education and pursue careers in conservation.

Rowan plans to pursue graduate-level studies in environmental and agricultural law and policy.

Director heads food service group

John T. Pence, director of the residence hall food service program, has assumed the presidency of the National Association of College and University Food Service.

The association has members from 600 college and university dining services throughout the United States, Australia, Canada, Hong Kong and Puerto Rico.

Pence has worked at the University for 22 years where he instructs students in the Department of Dietetics and Restaurant and Institutional Management.

Professor to lead research center

Paul Windley, faculty member since 1972, has been appointed director of the College Center for Research and Community Services in the College of Architecture and Design.

Research activity, Windley explained, will be coordinated through the center so that architecture and design faculty may have assistance in grant and proposal writing.

Windley, professor of architecture, will continue to teach and coordinate the college's graduate studies. His research interests are in rural and small community service planning for older people.

He succeeds Vernon P. Deines who returns to full-time teaching, research and service activities after directing the center for 20 years.

Chief justice's record should bear no flaws

President Reagan has had great influence on the federal courts because of the staggering number of district and appeals court appointments he has made.

However, many believe the Reagan administration has gone overboard in its nominations on the basis of ideology, especially with the recent nomination of William Rehnquist to replace Warren Burger as chief justice of the United States.

The fact that presidents nominate candidates of their ideological persuasion for court appointments is not surprising. However, when these candidates do not possess the high standards that should be maintained by protecters of the Constitution, the guarantees provided by this document are jeopardized.

Rehnquist's record may not be all black; however, it is tarnished enough to question his appointment to the highest position in the federal court system.

In 1981, Rehnquist was hospitalized to be weaned from a drug prescribed for severe and chronic back pain. Some say this addiction may have affected the decisions he made during this period as a Supreme Court justice.

After first denying he ever had knowledge of it, Rehnquist recently admitted to the Senate Judiciary Committee that in 1974 he knowingly purchased a summer house in Vermont with a deed which included a restrictive covenant barring resale to Jews. This type of restrictive covenant was made illegal in 1948 by the Supreme Court.

There have also been reports that Rehnquist challenged or harassed voters while serving as a poll watcher in Arizona in the early 1960s.

A big question remains as to Rehnquist's understanding of the Constitution itself. In the past, Rehnquist has made decisions which portray the belief that legislatures ought to prevail over the courts. However, one of the main purposes of the Constitution is to limit the powers of legislature.

Although thee charges against Rehnquist's record may not be damaging to the average American's character, Rehnquist is not destined to be an average American. Although one cannot expect perfection in a human, a chief justice of the United States should have a much cleaner record than Rehnquist provides. The chief justice of the United States should represent honesty, integrity and fairness to the highest possible degree.

Soviets should report accident information

Few or none of the residents of the western world really knew Tuesday why a Soviet passenger ship sank Sunday night.

As a disaster of manmade resources, Soviet officials handled the incident in their usual close-mouthed manner. As stated in an Associated Press article, Soviet officials typically keep information about disasters minimal.

The Soviets are not serving the best interests of the public with this policy of secrecy — the western public or their own public.

Although the sinking of the ship will not cause further damage to the Soviet population, it is still important for Soviet citizens to be aware of major accidents. In many cases major accidents will have a rebounding effect on the rest of the population, for example, the spread of radioactivity after the Chernobyl nuclear reactor explosion.

Because the Soviets suppressed information about the Chernobyl incident, residents of many European nations were exposed to the nuclear radiation, the results of which may not be seen for decades.

But European nations were not the only ones affected by the radiation; the Soviet people were first exposed and most severely. Had information on the accident been immediately broadcast, many lives might have been saved by quick evacuation.

It would be in the best interest of the world and the Soviet Union for the Soviet government to adopt an open media policy, if not in political matters, then at least in news events.

New attitude may end runaround

JONIE TRUED
Managing Editor

University President Jon Wefald's speech to more than 900 K-State faculty and staff members Thursday, may have marked the beginning of a new era for the University. For a university president to endorse a "change of attitude" among faculty members and vocally disapprove of giving students "the runaround," may well be unheard of.

Wefald never described exactly what was wrong with the soon-to-be-history K-State attitude, but identifying there is a University-wide problem with it and announcing it must be improved will perhaps put things in motion.

There are not likely to be any easy solutions, however. And it is "solutions" — in the plural. There is never only one problem, and seldom is there ever a single problem. Let one problem meet another problem and Bingo — you've got a population explosion on your hands.

Wefald's address to the attitude problem at K-State was directed primarily toward faculty and staff members because they set the tone for the University. Tone affects attitude and attitude affects performance, all in direct relationships.

It is obvious, using K-State's falling enrollment levels as evidence, that a change of tone is necessary for the University's survival. But along with a change in attitude there must also be a renewed sense of awareness about the role of a university in students' lives.

And students' lives are changing.

No longer are all students concerned only with academic performance, student government elections and weekend games.

Faculty and administration must realize and come to terms with the high numbers of students who now must devote 30-40 (occasionally as high as 60) hours per week just to earn living expenses.

The "working student" is no longer just a phenomenon. According to the Department of Labor Statistics, printed in NUCEA Continuing Education News, more than half the higher education students between the ages of 16 and 24 now hold some type of job during the academic year.

Working students have different needs than non-working students. They also have very strict time restraints. They have to plan their day almost down to the last minute. This is something faculty are going to have to accept and consider when organizing class schedules.

This is not a plea for making classes easier. It won't benefit anyone if students don't learn what the course and instructor is supposed to be teaching them.

But there is a common practice among some instructors to wait until the first few days of class to inform students their exams, quizzes and help sessions will be on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday nights.

When several hundred students are taking a class, a separate reference number appears in the line schedule notifying students the lecture is at one time and the tests are at another. This is not the case with all classes, however.

When there is no notation in the line schedule about a different time for course exams and the instructor informs students exams will not be given in designated class hours, it can be a disaster for working students.

Working students often do not have the most choice jobs or hours. They work when they are needed for whatever wage an employer decides, usually low, therefore creating the need for the student to work a lot of hours to pay bills. For example, waiters and waitresses normally do not make more than $2 an hour and they do not get rich off of tips.

The final straw for many working students is when they approach the instructor of the class to inform them of the conflict with a work schedule. The student is often met with cool impatience or uncompromising reserve.

This type of occurrence is probably one of the things Wefald was referring to when he said K-State needs a change of attitude.

We need to go beyond a change of attitude, though. A change of attitude is only the first step in a series that K-State needs to make.

If we stall out after the first step we will be no better off than before. Our change of attitude must result in some positive constructive changes in the philosophy and practices of the University to make it accessible to all students who desire an education.

Barriers to education must come down. And some of those barriers are simply outdated, confusing and poorly considered course schedules.

Businesses profit on family decline

SUSAN BAIRD
Collegian Columnist

Through the diligence of the greeting card industry, Sunday, Sept. 7, is another monumental day in history.

In the tradition of Father's Day and Mother's Day, the United States will celebrate Grandparents' Day. This day was earmarked for Americans everywhere to honor their grandparents.

In today's society, the task of honoring someone has been made simple with the help of big business. A person merely takes five minutes out of his hectic schedule, scrawls his name to a cute little card with a bunch of flowers on the cover, shoves it into an envelope and drops the paper sentiment in the mail.

With the increase in divorces and single parenting, sending a card to every set of grandparents or each grandparent could be more time-consuming and more expensive. But the industry tries to convince the American public that those moments of joy an elderly person receives from a card's syrupy message are worth the two or three minutes an individual spends filling out the card.

I'm sure big business has a point. In the twilight of a person's years, it would be gratifying to be revered by one's offspring because he or she gave them life.

And what better way to encourage people to honor others than by setting aside a special day in their name. These drugstore holidays give greeting card dealers, florists and candy makers an excellent excuse to demonstrate how their services can best convey an individual's deepest feelings.

Although these industries obviously profit from this or any other special relative's day, I don't think we can completely blame them for capitalizing on family relationships. They may have lobbied long and hard in Congress for these days, but only because they felt there was a market for this type of sentimentality.

Because the longevity of these days of observance proves they are successful, there is no question about the need for them. But this brings a deeper question to mind.

Why do Americans feel a need for this type of day?

As more young families settle away from their parents, ties with relatives may become weaker. Perhaps sending a decorative card or a potted plant is the easiest way Americans have found to prevent family ties from weakening and possibly breaking.

People don't want to ignore the family altogether, but they can't take the time to write a short note or call someone on the telephone. To cleanse their conscience, people send a token message.

Unfortunately, these once-a-year remembrances don't say much for the devotion of Americans to the family, especially the older members. By mailing an annual paper thought, a person doesn't reaffirm his or her love for a particular family member. He or she only reassures a family member that someone in this cold, cruel world still remembers he exists.

Perhaps people should take the time to send a few small, sincere thoughts to others throughout the year, not just one large, artificial thought each year.

Research progresses

Editor,

Re: Jonie Trued's column, "'Star Wars' resembles movie script," in the Aug. 26 Collegian.

In her article, Trued gave her views of the Stategic Defense Initiative project, its progress and its fallacies.

As a member of the "pipe-dreaming" scientific community "supposedly researching" SDI technology, I felt the need to respond.

I work for the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico on SDI research. The group I work for, and many others, put a great deal of effort into this program. I can assure Trued that the research effort is alive and well. The program at LANL is not "supposed" research, but a multi-million dollar project producing very positive results. I do not expect Trued to know this, but I do expect her to keep her personal beliefs and information presented as facts separate. Her article consisted mainly of speculations by the uninformed and very few facts.

I noted that her view of SDI as defense stations located strategically to target Soviet missiles and "shoot them with lasers" is extremely limited, as depicted in the media. Now who is relying on "scripts" for information?

In reality, the SDI project makes use of lasers, neutral particle beams and more "forceful" techniques, all working in unison. As I am only allowed 300 words, I will not summarize SDI here, except to say that there are hundreds of possible scenarios.

One of the most glaring errors, due to gross generalizations, was her statement that "currently, the most powerful lasers in existence can't hit the broadside of a barn at 20 paces and inflict significant damage." This is responsible journalism? I suggest that Trued do more research and take a few physics classes before she shares any of her "knowledge" regarding America's national defense systems.

SDI balances power

Editor,

Re: Scott Miller's column, "'Star Wars' hurts chance for peace" in Thursday's Collegian.

It is obvious that this columnist has not done his full homework as to why President Reagan has refused to bargain with Mikhail Gorbachev on the arms control issue.

At present the Soviet Union holds an estimated 10,000 more nuclear warheads than does the United States. What Reagan wants to do is reduce the Soviet Union's nuclear arsenal to an even balance of nuclear war missiles for both superpowers. This proposed idea was flatly refused as Gorbachev left the bargaining table at the last talks with the Soviet Union.

With "Star Wars" in mind we are able to even the strategic arms level of balance of which Gorbachev is now worried that the United States will take advantage. I understand that sacrifices will have to be made, however, I believe it will be to the best interest of the security of the United States.

Accuracy important

Editor,

Re: The editorial "Budget cuts provoke Koeppe's resignation" in the Aug. 26 Collegian.

Imagine my surprise when upon opening my Collegian, I saw the editorial headline that told me budget cuts had brought about the resignation of Owen Koeppe as provost. I had heard about the resignation on the radio the day before and as a member of the presidential search committee I knew the resignation was forthcoming, but the headline still shocked me.

As students of journalism, the Collegian staff should understand that many people read only the headlines of stories and columns, and because of that, the headlines must be considered as carefully as any other aspect of the paper. That headline told me that Koeppe was forced to resign because of cuts in K-State's operating budget, which was definitely not the case.

I must also protest the use of unsigned editorials, although the editorials are the majority opinion of the editorial board, the paper is funded through students' fees. Students have the right to know whose particular view is being voiced in the editorial. No two editorial board members would write an editorial the exact same way.

I understand the time pressures that you are faced with as you try to get out an organized paper at the start of the year. I think you are doing a good job, but I think you could be doing better.

Minority group poverty rate increases

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The poverty rate among Hispanics may soon overtake that of the nation's black population as a record 5.2 million Hispanics lived below the poverty line last year, according to a study released Tuesday.

"While poverty worsened among Hispanics, it improved among blacks, making the Hispanic poverty rate now only slightly lower than the black poverty rate," said the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities in a study.

The study noted that the black poverty rate of 31.3 percent last year was about the same as it was in 1979. But the poverty rate for Hispanics has increased from 21.8 percent to 29 percent during the same six-year period, said the center, which based its findings on U.S. Census data.

Hispanics expected to surpass blacks

"If current trends continue, Hispanics will pass blacks in the next few years as the ethnic group with the highest poverty rate in the nation," said the study.

Already, the poverty rate among certain groups of Hispanics exceeded that of corresponding segments of the black population.

The poverty rate among Hispanic married couples was 17 percent versus a 12.2 percent rate among black married couples. The study found that 53.1 percent of Hispanic families headed by single women lived in poverty compared to 50.5 percent of black families headed by women.

"The only reason that the overall Hispanic poverty rate is still lower than the black poverty rate is that the percentage of families that are headed by a female is lower for Hispanics than for blacks," the study said.

The report also found that per capita income for Hispanics was $6,613 last year, compared to $6,840 for blacks.

The median income of Hispanic families dropped $478 last year to $19,027 while it rose $803 to $16,786 among black families and increased $478 to $29,152 for white families.

The median income of Hispanic families has dropped 9.8 percent between 1973 and 1985, compared to a 4.9 percent drop among all American families and a 4.6 percent decline among black families.

The report also found that a record 2.6 million Hispanic children lived in poverty in 1985 — 39.9 percent of the total population of Hispanics under age 18.

Overall, the poverty rate among Hispanics increased from 28.4 percent in 1984 to 29 percent last year, according to the Census Bureau.

The report found that the poverty rate among Hispanics in the South — including Texas — rose from 26 percent in 1984 to 27.7 percent.

The poverty rate among Hispanics in the West increased from 25.3 percent to 26 percent last year. The poverty rate among Hispanics in the Northeast increased from 38.7 to 39.2 percent despite a $123 increase in median family income among Hispanics in the region.

Lawmakers' telegram discourages embargo

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Seven Democratic members of the Kansas Legislature from southeast Kansas Monday sent a telegram to three Republican members of the state's congressional delegation urging them to oppose any embargo on grain shipments to South Africa.

They said their wire was prompted by the support for such an embargo which was expressed last week by House Speaker Mike Hayden, the Republican nominee for governor in the November general election.

Hayden told a group of agriculture writers at Manhattan he believes the U.S. government should prohibit grain shipments to South Africa as a way of protesting that nation's apartheid policy of separation of the races.

Lt. Gov. Tom Docking, the Democratic nominee, said he opposes grain embargoes because they hurt Kansas farmers economically.

The Democratic legislators' telegram to Sens. Bob Dole and Nancy Kassebaum and U.S. Rep. Bob Whittaker was made public by state Sen. Michael Johnston of Parsons.

Court overturns jury in toxic shock death

By The Associated Press

DENVER — An $11.5 million judgment against International Playtex, Inc., returned by a federal court jury in Kansas in a toxic shock syndrome death was overturned by the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday and a new trial ordered.

The decision said the jury should have been allowed to determine what role the victim might have had in her own death, and whether manufacturers of other tampons might have contributed to it.

A U.S. District Court jury in Wichita, held Feb. 25, 1985, that Playtex was liable, in part, for the 1983 death of Betty O'Gilvie of Wichita. The company appealed the decision.

Records showed that O'Gilvie had purchased and used the Playtex tampon products, became ill, and consulted her family doctor, specifically about the possibility of TSS.

He advised her that he did not believe TSS was something to be concerned about and diagnosed her condition as scarlet fever and a yeast infection. He prescribed a penicillin-based antibiotic appropriate for scarlet fever, but not effective against TSS.

Her illness had started on March 30, and worsened on March 31. She was rushed to a Wichita hospital, and despite treatment by specialists was dead by April 2. The cause of death was listed as toxic shock syndrome.

A lawsuit followed, and a jury awarded $250,000 to O'Gilvie's estate for her pain and suffering; $1.25 million to her survivors as compensatory damages, and $10 million in punitive damages.

The percentage of fault was allocated 20 percent to her family doctor, and 80 percent to Playtex.

The judgment was entered for those amounts, but U.S. District Judge Patrick Kelly subsequently granted a partial change in the punitive damages, reducing them from $10 million to $1.35 million.

Playtex later filed a motion for a new trial, claiming the trial court erred by not giving comparative fault instructions about O'Gilvie's conduct, as well as that of other tampon manufacturers.

The woman apparently had used the products of other suppliers after she was stricken.

Playtex also maintains the court's instructions and comments about Playtex's toxic shock warnings misled the jury, and that the evidence was insufficient to support punitive damages.

'The Gift' goes 'heavy' on light scenes

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Foreign movies sometimes get a bad reputation for being heavy-going, but there are plenty of light foreign films as well.

Film Review

Director Michel Lang's "The Gift" is one of the latter. It's a fluff-filled French sex farce with no pretensions whatever.

The movie is about a retiring bank executive (played by Pierre Mondy) who is making a final business trip to Milan. Unknown to him, his coworkers have arranged a retirement gift — the services of a high-priced call girl (played by the incredibly beautiful Clio Goldsmith). She is assigned the same train compartment as Mondy, and when she starts wetting her lips and exposing long expanses of thigh, he thinks he's actually turning her on.

After that the movie becomes a male menopausal fantasy, similar to Blake Edwards' "10" and Billy Wilder's "Seven-Year Itch." But this time something is slightly amiss; it's difficult to sympathize with this married man chasing after the girl of his dreams.

In "The Seven-Year Itch" Tom Ewell poses as much of a threat to Marilyn Monroe as a grade school boy. As much as he would like to get her into bed, we all know that ultimately he's too much of a family man to ever follow through.

If the movie had made it clear that Mondy felt his home life was unsatisfying and stifling, the movie might have worked. But little time is devoted to this aspect.

Where the movie does come alive is near the end. Once the affair is over and Mondy returns home, he wants his wife (Claudia Cardinale) to replay the seduction on the train. He tells her what role to play, but things don't go as he had planned, especially once she starts playing the role so well that he becomes suspicious. Instead of getting titillated by her actions, he gets angry.

At this point the movie turns upside down the male fantasy of all women as sex objects. It made me wish the whole movie had been developed around this idea instead of around the interlude with the call girl. She's little more than a beautiful nymph and not a very interesting character. But the wife, especially as played by the still-very-sensual Cardinale, is very real.

THE MYSTIQUE OF MESQUITE

As the sun begins to set over the state of Sonora in northern Mexico, people start arriving at the local asabero — Sonora's version of a hangout — in cars, on bicycles or even by burro. Tortillas, hot salsa and pots of guacamole are plentiful.

But it's the smell of meat grilling over the pits of mesquite wood that brings them back.

While mesquite grilling has been popular in the Southwest since the Indians discovered the wood, the rest of the United States is just beginning to catch up.

Jack Ray, owner of 18 Texas Tumbleweed Restaurants, began his empire 10 years ago when ranchers still considered the small tree to be a pest. Ray, known as the "King of Mesquite," has become accustomed to giving advice to people as far away as Japan and England.

"Mesquite is pretty big all over," Ray said during a phone interview from Houston. "I have even gotten calls from hotels wanting to know how to use it. It's easy to cook with, if you know how."

The mesquite tree is native to the Southwest, mainly found in Texas, Arizona, New Mexico and Southern California. It thrives on moisture but will grow in an arid region.

Richard Lise, president of the Longhorn Mesquite Co. in Houston, said each tree will extend its roots to gather moisture. Ranchers want to rid their land of the trees because they rob moisture from grasses meant for cattle.

Mesquite is a dense wood that burns at 1,200 degrees Fahrenheit, where as hickory and oak burn at 800 to 850 F. According to California Extension Agent George York, mesquite burns extremely hot because of its unique oils.

"All wood contains oils. This particular oil makes it burn much hotter," York said. "The aromatic oil actually contains very little flavor."

Trying to describe the mesquite taste, which comes from the smoke, to someone who has never tried it before is difficult, said David Porterfield, owner of Porterfield's Fish House in Fort Smith, Ark.

"All I can tell you is the flavor is totally different," Porterfield said. "It has almost a sweet, aroma-type smell and taste to it."

The sweet taste and smell comes from the high sugar content in the wood, Lise said. "The smell goes onto the meat from the smoke."

Besides smelling and tasting good, Porterfield said mesquite-cooked food is free of chemicals.

"Health-conscious people were experimenting cooking with fish a few years ago," he said. "They discovered fish cooked over mesquite. Fish is lowest in calories to begin with, and there are no chemicals added because the wood is natural. Charcoal has chemicals added. Mesquite makes the perfect diet food."

Whether someone is on a diet or just enjoys good cooking, experimenting with mesquite can be easy despite horror stories about the excessive heat from mesquite.

Ray recalled the first time he tried backyard grilling with mesquite. "I came home from a dude ranch in Arizona where they had grilled steaks over mesquite," he said. "I borrowed a $350 barbecue grill from a neighbor. I put the wood chunks in the grill, slapped the meat on and closed the lid.

"Five minutes later my wife yelled that it (the grill) was smoking badly and there were flames coming up the sides. I went to check on it, opened it up and the grill had melted and what was left of the meat was sitting on the wood. The worst thing about it was I had to buy a new $350 grill for my neighbor."

Mesquite grilling can be done easily by following some tips from the experts. Mesquite wood can be purchased at local grocery stores.

"It's ideal to use a mixture of green and dry wood," Porterfield said. "Dry wood burns hotter and quicker and green (wood) will smoke a lot more and add the flavor."

'No question about it. It's the finest cookin' around.'
—Jack Ray

Porterfield said to soak half the mesquite chunks in water overnight to simulate green wood. Build the fire by starting with charcoal and letting it burn to coals. About 15 minutes before putting on the meat, add the mesquite mixture of green (soaked) and dry wood.

"The secret to cooking with mesquite is to have the fire hot enough to sear the outer edges of the meat," Lise said. "That fuses the pores together trapping the juices inside. Cooking over hickory is much slower and the pores open up, allowing all the juices to fall through."

Porterfield recommends not doing anything to prepare the meat before grilling. However, before cooking fish on the grill, he said to coat the fillets in cooking oil to keep them from sticking to the grill. Any type of meat or vegetable can be cooked over mesquite.

"The best thing about mesquite is that you don't have to add any exotic sauces," he said. "Salmon steak or swordfish are good because they don't flake."

Darren Quick, assistant manager of The Mesquite Tree Restaurant in Hutchinson, said mesquite is especially good for fish.

"We serve snapper, salmon and trout, all of which are very fishy tasting," Quick said. "The mesquite takes the fishy taste out. It gives it a real smooth taste."

It is a taste that connoisseurs of mesquite cooking vow is the best.

"No question about it," Ray said. "It's the finest cookin' around."

Nedyak said.

The 888 cruise ship passengers were all Soviet tourists, mostly from the Ukraine and Baltic republics, he said. He said about 270 of the 346 crew members were among the survivors.

Nedyak said he was not sure how many children were aboard. He said five of those rescued and two found dead were children.

Nedyak said that among the survivors of the Admiral Nakhimov was the captain, Vadim G. Markov, who had skippered the ship since 1959. He identified the captain of the freighter as Viktor I. Tkachenko.

Lloyd's Registry of Ships says the Admiral Nakhimov was 575 feet long and was built in Germany in 1925 as a steam-powered vessel. It was later refitted with diesel engines.

Archives of the North German Lloyd shipping concern, which owned the vessel when it sailed under the name "Berlin," show the German navy pressed it into transport service in the Baltic Sea at the start of World War II in 1939.

In 1944, it was converted to a Red Cross ship and carried German refugees westward from the eastern provinces being taken over by the Soviet army.

According to the reference book "Great Passenger Ships of the World, Vol. 3," it struck a Soviet mine on Feb. 1, 1945, and sank near the Baltic port of Swinemunde.

Judge charges woman in actor's death

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Cathy Evelyn Smith, a former rock backup singer who injected comic John Belushi with drugs before he died, was sentenced to three years in prison Tuesday by a judge who called her "the source of the poison."

Smith had pleaded no contest to a charge of involuntary manslaughter and three counts of furnishing and administering dangerous drugs in Belushi's heroin and cocaine overdose death on March 5, 1982.

Judge David Horowitz rejected an impassioned plea from Smith's attorney, Howard Weitzman, who urged that she be placed on probation and be allowed to enter a drug rehabilitation program.

The true responsibility for Belushi's death must be attributed to the comedian himself, Horowitz said, because "his decision to live a drug-infested life led to his death."

He told Smith this did not absolve her and, declaring "you were the source of the poison," said that only prison time could teach her a lesson.

Smith had faced a maximum possible sentence of eight years and eight months in prison.

Belushi's widow, a younger brother and his sister-in-law sat in the front row of the courtroom as the sentence was pronounced. They had appealed to the judge to put Smith behind bars as a lesson to youngsters who might be tempted to try drugs.

Weitzman repeatedly summoned the ghost of Belushi, saying the comic surely would speak in favor of Smith's probation if he was present.

"I believe if John Belushi were standing right here today and looked at your honor, he would say, 'Wait a minute judge. I lived my life as I wanted to live it. Don't blame her. She did what I wanted to do,'" Weitzman said.

The prosecutor, Deputy District Attorney Elden Fox, said he agreed that drug addiction is a disease but in Smith's case it became a crime, and he recommended the three-year sentence ultimately imposed by Horowitz.

"John Belushi was a willing participant," Fox said. "But John Belushi would not have died, when he died, except for the heroin administered by the defendant in this case."

He said that in reality, she would serve about a year and a half before she could be paroled.

Belushi, a star of TV's "Saturday Night Live" and the movies "Animal House," "The Blues Brothers" and "1941," died in a rented bungalow at the Chateau Marmonte Hotel above Sunset Boulevard at the age of 33.

Smith, now 39, was questioned at the time of Belushi's death, but released. She was arrested a year later after she told of her involvement in a National Enquirer interview and was quoted as saying she killed Belushi.

Even today, there are still a few students who don't have an HP calculator.

Burning the midnight oil may be necessary.

Burning the 2:00 or 3:00 or 4:00 AM oil is absurd.

Especially when an HP calculator can get the answers you want — in time to get a good night's sleep.

For instance, our HP-15C Professional Scientific Calculator has more built-in advanced math and statistical power than any other calculator. Our HP-41 Advanced Scientific Calculators have even more potential.

That's because there are better than 2500 software packages available for them — more than for any other calculator.

There's even a special plug-in software package (we call it the Advantage Module) that's designed to handle the specific problems an engineering student has to solve in his, or her, course work.

No wonder professionals in engineering and the physical sciences widely regard HP calculators as the best you can get.

So check one out. Then, when your mother calls to ask if you're getting enough sleep, you won't have to lie.

KC still searching for running back

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The search goes on in Kansas City for a running back to lead the Chiefs out of the National Football League doldrums.

Ethan Horton, the man the club's brass thought could achieve that challenge, was waived Monday just 16 months after being the first running back chosen in the NFL draft.

Horton became the second first-round pick to leave the club this summer, and his departure underscored the club's desperation at the running back position.

"It's something you hate," said Les Miller, the Chiefs' director of player personnel, about releasing their first-round pick of a year ago. "But at the same time, you look at the makeup of your team and the thing you're trying to do is put the 45 guys out there that give you the best chance of winning."

The Chiefs drafted the 6-foot-4, 225-pound Horton, hoping the former North Carolina star could provide them with an all-purpose threat along the lines of Marcus Allen or Chuck Foreman — a big back, who could grind out rushing yardage and provide the pass-oriented offense with another receiving threat.

As a rookie, he gained 146 yards rushing in 48 carries, another 185 yards on 22 pass receptions and scored four touchdowns.

During the recently-completed exhibition season, Horton managed just 98 yards in 32 carries.

As it turned out, Horton was unable to get outside or pound out the tougher up-the-middle yards.

"We figured he'd be able to hit it up inside," said Coach John Mackovic. "That was one area, though, where he didn't display the ability to get the tough yards, the short yards."

The Chiefs kept five backs — veterans Boyce Green, Mike Pruitt, Herman Heard and Jeff Smith, plus free agent Chris Smith.

"He had the best opportunity that we could give him," said Mackovic said of Horton. "But when it was all said and done, we felt this was in the best interest of our football team."

Although disappointed, Horton said he remains confident he'll become a productive NFL running back.

"I may have disapointed some of my friends and people that really look up to me, but I'll be back," he said. "I know I can play in the NFL."

Horton's one-year stint was the shortest of any first-round pick by the Chiefs. He became the first No. 1 choice waived by the club since the release in 1980 of guard Rod Walters, the team's top pick in the 1976 draft.

Kansas City, which earlier this summer peddled 1981 first-round pick Willie Scott to New England, heads into the 1986 season with 16 new players on its roster.

Navratilova, Becker win at U.S. Open

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Two-time champion Martina Navratilova moved another step closer to her fourth straight appearance in the women's singles final Tuesday by defeating her doubles partner, Pam Shriver, in the the U.S. Open Tennis Championships.

The 6-2, 6-4 quarterfinal victory sends Navratilova, the No. 1 seed at the National Tennis Center, against the winner of Tuesday night's quarterfinal pairing between third-seeded Steffi Graf of West Germany and No. 8 Bonnie Gadusek.

In the men's singles Tuesday, Wimbledon champion Boris Becker of West Germany and Joakim Nystrom of Sweden advanced into the quarterfinals. Becker, the No. 3 seed, ousted qualifier Gary Donnelly 6-4, 6-3, 6-7, 6-4, while Nystrom, seeded seventh, stopped Matt Anger 7-6, 6-2, 6-2.

Other fourth-round matches Tuesday saw No. 2 Mats Wilander of Sweden against No. 16 Miloslav Mecir of Czechoslovakia, and Todd Witsken against Czechoslovakia's Milan Srejber.

Navratilova said her victory over Shriver was bittersweet.

"I seem to feel the strain more against her because we're such good friends," the world's top-ranked women's player said. "It's not a pleasurable victory."

Although Navratilova holds a 26-3 career edge over Shriver, two of Shriver's victories have come on the hard courts in the U.S. Open — the last time in the quarterfinals in 1982.

"I've lost to her a few times, and that gets me up more than for an opponent I've never lost to," Navratilova said.

Shriver was impressed with Navratilova.

"I think she's pretty much on a par with what she wants to be playing," Shriver said. "She covers the court and reaches better than anybody. She goes back for a lob better than anybody."

Shriver described the match perfectly as Navratilova dominated, whether ripping a cross-court passing shot or deftly dropping a touch volley.

Parrish designs alterations in football lineup

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Head football coach Stan Parrish came to K-State to make changes. Some of those changes included switching some players from their familiar positions, which Parrish said he believes has benefited the team.

"I think all the switches have been very, very positive for the kids and for the team," said Parrish, who has made nine such changes.

Two of the biggest moves have involved junior Tim MacDonald, who switched to nose guard from linebacker, and senior Gary Harshberger, who moved to center from tight end.

Two other starters have changed positions from last year. Junior Grady Newton went from defensive end to outside linebacker and senior Kevin Humphrey moved from defensive end to tackle.

MacDonald, a Leawood native, has been asked to anchor Parrish's new defense that consists of five defensive linemen instead of the four-man front used last season.

"We took MacDonald, who is a big, strong, tough guy, and we felt he had the attributes that you're looking for in a noseguard," Parrish said.

The 6-foot-3-inch MacDonald, who added about 30 pounds to this spring's 235-pound frame, said he is pleased with his development at the new position.

"The coaches are being real patient with me. It's coming along well," he said.

MacDonald said the experience at linebacker has given him insights into his new job.

"Last year I depended on the defensive linemen to keep the offensive linemen off me," he said. "So I can identify with what I have to do now to keep the offensive linemen off our linebackers."

MacDonald said he has had to make an adjustment from the more freewheeling position of linebacker to being more contained on the line.

"I think I have to not get so frustrated because I'm limited in what I can do because I get double-teamed a lot," he said. "You feel like you should make the play when actually you're doing your job even if you don't make the play. That's hard to live with, having been a linebacker and always being around the ball."

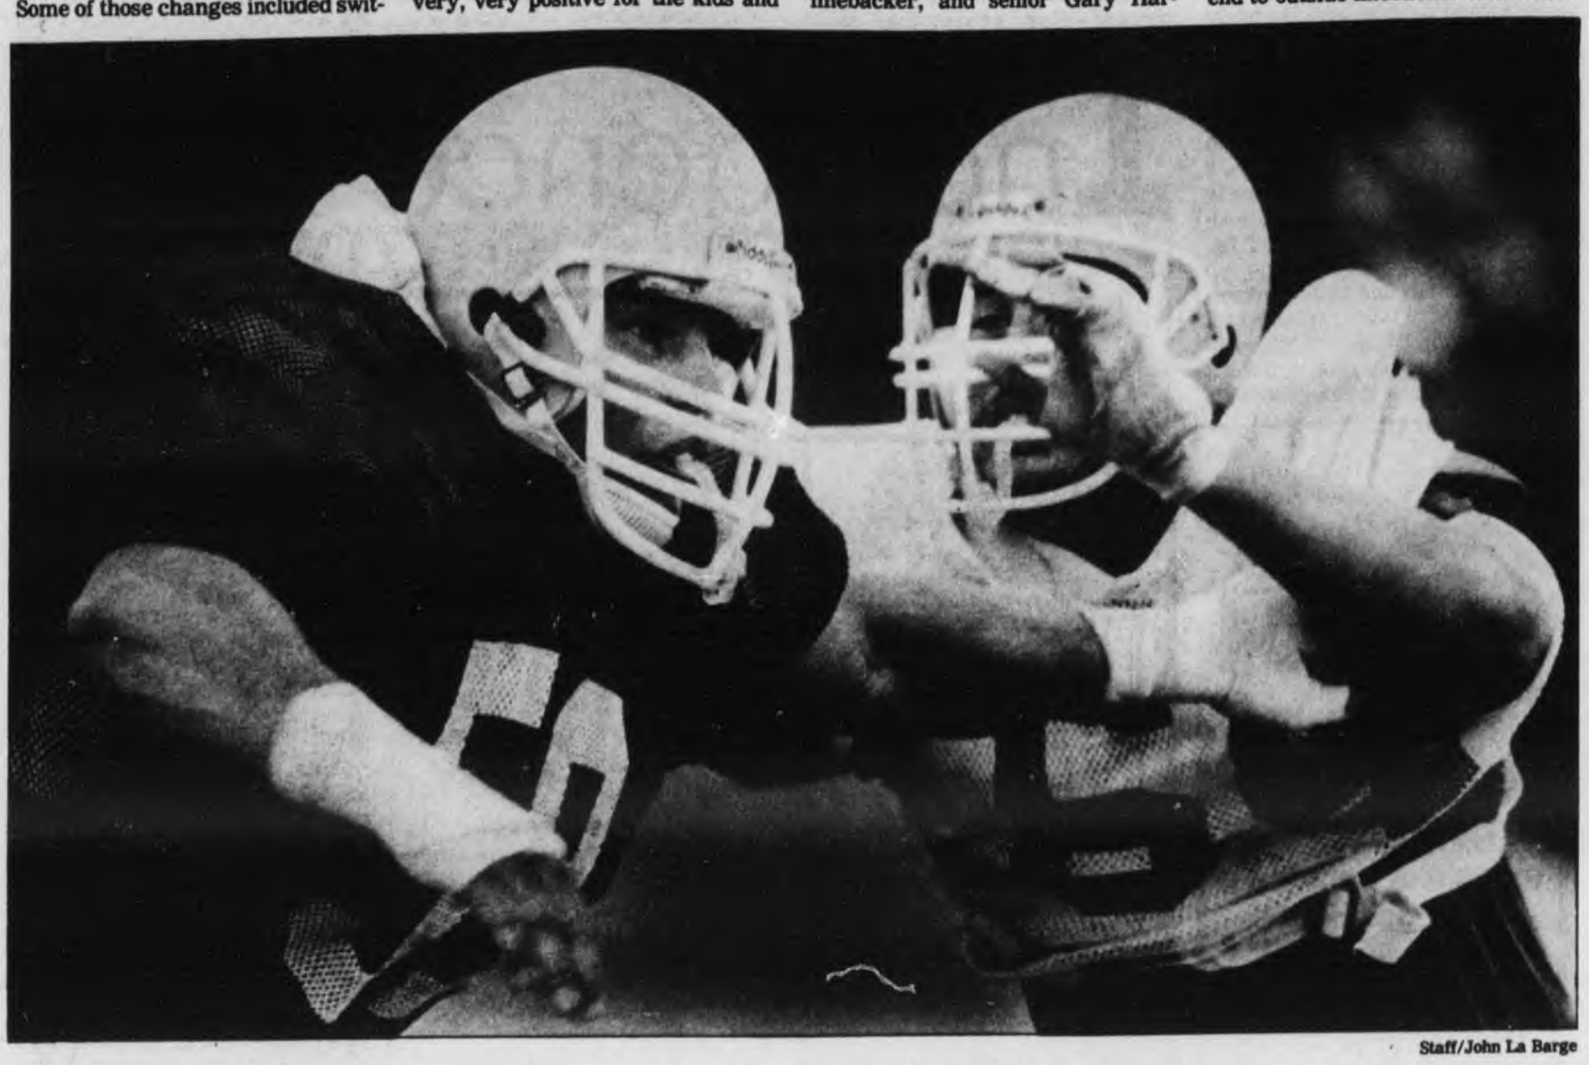
Parrish seemed cautious in his assessment of MacDonald's performance at nose guard after the season-opening victory over Western Illinois.

"He played OK," Parrish said. "I have high expectations for him. He did a good job. He's at a new spot. He's learning what he's doing, but I think he's going to be a real, real fine player for us."

Harshberger's move from tight end was necessitated by an injury to Rob Goode, last year's starting center. Harshberger, who is from Minneola, said his reaction to the move could be summed up in one word — shocking.

"All winter last year I was working on losing weight, getting lean, getting fast," Harshberger said. "I knew he (Parrish) was a speed-orientated guy and I'd have to be fast if I was going to play receiver."

The 6-2, 215-pound Harshberger said his forte as a tight end was blocking, so the transition has been more of a mental one.



"As far as mentally, at center you have a lot more to think about. That was hard for me," he said. "You've got to listen to the snap count, (think about) where it's going, who your (blocking) responsibility is and defensive fronts."

Harshberger said he is pleased with his progress.

"I'm coming along," he said. "It will take me awhile, but I think I've come a long way since I made the transition."

INJURY NOTES: The hip injury to starting linebacker David Wallace has turned out to be more serious than originally thought. Wallace will be out for the next two or three games. Defensive tackle John Crawford will be out of action Saturday with a bad ankle.

Punter Troy Faunce (knee) and defensive back Robert Easterwood (wrist) both suffered mild injuries against Western Illinois and should be ready to play. Rob Goode, who entered the fall as the starting center before a back ailment sidelined him, should be back in uniform in two weeks.

Staff/John La Barge

Tim MacDonald, a junior nose guard, (58) slips through the grasp of Ray Kempthorne, a freshman linebacker, (64) during drills at Tuesday's football practice. MacDonald made the move to nose guard from the linebacker position as a part of head coach Stan Parrish's defensive alterations.

Grid win represents part of K-State's attitude adjustment

TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

It's kind of fun when K-State wins a football game.

Ask Stan Parrish, Larry Travis or even Jon Wefald.

K-State won more than just a football game Saturday when it drubbed Western Illinois 35-7. It won a portion of its pride back.

As a university, K-State needed a win Saturday. The bumps and bruises this school has been tormented with through the last year have been incredible.

Things are on the upswing in the land of the Wildcats. There is a resurgence of pride at this school and much of the credit for that can be credited to the class acts of University President Wefald, Athletic Director Travis and football coach Parrish.

Travis is a man who keeps his nose to the job, and his job is to turn K-State athletics around. Last year was very long indeed for Travis.

He had to fire football coach Jim Dickey. K-State lost its most famous family member when basketball coach Jack Hartman retired. Basketball star Norris Coleman, a primary focal point of school pride, was investigated by the National Collegiate Athletic Association. And many other things went sour last year.

Yet, Travis kept his chin up and never refused to feel sorry for himself or the University. He has diligently seen his programs endure long and losing seasons. This year he will see the rewards of patience.

The hiring of Parrish, a man who knows how to win, was an important step in the rebuilding business.

Travis is not on his own. Wefald might as well have been hand picked by Travis. The two know K-State needs to win on the football field and the basketball court if the University is to turn things around on an overall basis.

Wefald has many more ideas to turn upward the faltering tide of K-State's enrollment, but athletic success is a vital cog in those plans.

Wefald knows what a positive image can do for a school. Prior to the game Saturday, Wefald passed through the press box making sure he introduced himself to members of the press, as well as members of the press box crew.

That's classy — that's the type of visible relations with the media K-State needs.

Following the game, a very happy Wefald and Travis were waiting for Parrish when he completed his press conference.

Wefald shook Parrish's hand, said "coach you son-of-a-gun," gave Parrish a hug and said, "I'm proud of you."

That's classy — that's the kind of support the K-State coaches and players need from administration.

Travis and his staff could be seen after the game in an Aggieville bar mingling with the students who, too, were celebrating the Wildcats' win. Travis and his associate athletic directors Lee Moon and Steve Miller were there to talk to students and interact with the people whose support is so vital to K-State's success.

Class like that is the kind of visibility from the athletic leaders students can rally behind.

K-State will play the Red Raiders of Texas Tech on Saturday. The Raiders will be much more talented than Western Illinois, and the game promises to be a big challenge for Parrish and his football team.

If K-State leaves Lubbock, Texas, with a victory, this school will go into a frenzy of pride.

But no matter if K-State wins or loses, you know that Parrish, Travis and Wefald will handle it with class.

And that's the first step in turning K-State around.

New test aids heart attack victims, evaluates cardiovascular condition

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — A new test for heart attack victims can help doctors quickly learn how much heart muscle has been killed by their seizures and how much is likely to recover, researchers said Tuesday.

This information, available within a day of the heart attack, can help physicians tailor the best therapy for heart victims.

The test has been under development for 10 years by doctors at Massachusetts General Hospital. So far, it has been used there on about 100 heart patients, and they have suffered no harmful side effects. A report on the work is published in the September issue of the journal Circulation.

Heart attacks — what doctors call myocardial infarctions — kill an estimated half million Americans annually.

The researchers say their test is the first practical use in heart attacks for the new class of medical tools known as monoclonal antibodies. Although still experimental, they said that if further testing progresses smoothly it could be routinely available within two years.

Dr. Edgar Haber, head of the team that developed the test, said its major advantages over existing techniques are speed and accuracy in the critical hours following heart attacks.

"I would say that the diagnostic information obtained will be very helpful in making a more precise clinical judgment as to what to do next in the treatment of myocardial infarction and how aggressive to be," Haber said in an interview.

When a heart attack strikes, the flow of blood to the heart's own muscle is blocked and some of the muscle dies. The new test shows how much muscle is dead and how much nearby tissue is likely to recover.

Results of the new test are available within 12 to 24 hours after an attack. It uses specially crafted antibodies that attach themselves to myosin, a protein that's a principal building material of heart tissue. Ordinarily, myosin is covered by the cell's membrane but it becomes exposed when the cell dies. When the myosin antibody binds itself to a section of the heart, it means that area has died.

The antibody is tagged with radioactive atoms that can be scanned by radiation detectors to produce a picture.

Depending on the size and location of the dead spot, doctors might treat the heart attack with drugs, coronary bypass surgery or a balloon catheter that reopens blocked arteries.

Tapes reveal Nixon's final days

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Three months before he resigned, a confident President Richard M. Nixon called Watergate "the thinnest scandal in American history," in a private tape-recorded conversation released Tuesday by the National Archives.

Most of the 4,467 tapes were of various public and official events recorded by the White House Communications Agency between Jan. 20, 1969, when Nixon became president, and Aug. 9, 1974, when he resigned under the prospect of impeachment and conviction for taking part in the Watergate coverup.

"If these charges on Watergate were true, nobody would have to ask me to resign — I wouldn't serve for one month," Nixon told Rabbi Baruch Korff on May 13, 1974.

"But I know they are not true," he said, "therefore I will stay here and do the job I was elected to do as well as I can and let the constitutional process make the final verdict."

There was talk after Nixon's resignation of bringing criminal charges against him. But Gerald R. Ford, who succeeded him, put a stop to any such action by issuing a pardon for Nixon, "for any crimes."

The audio tapes and a large batch of television recordings were part of the materials left behind by Nixon and his top aides. The government seized the materials intending to make them public, but a series of lawsuits and congressional actions over the years have prevented it.

On June 26, regulations went into effect to govern public access, but they permitted challenges by Nixon and 60 others who asked to be notified before any release. The group of recordings released Tuesday also was subject to challenges, but because they were mostly in the public domain no one apparently tried to stop them.

Korff, who raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for the "President Nixon Justice Fund" to help defray Nixon's legal fees, told the president at the start of the interview he would use the material for a paperback book. The White House Communications Agency usually records such interviews.

Nixon returned again and again to the way the news media handled Watergate.

"They are consumed by this issue," he said. "I can see in the eyes of them ... their hatred and frustration. I do not feel hatred. I feel sorry for them in a way."

Asked how historians in 50 years would assess the Watergate scandal, Nixon said it would be regarded as something difficult to understand, particularly "in the campaign of an individual who is a political pro, which I am."

He told Korff, as he told the public, that if he had paid attention to the campaign instead of trying to get the United States extricated from the Vietnam War, "Watergate would not have happened."

Of Watergate he said: "To say this is like the Teapot Dome (scandal of the 1920s) is comparing apples to oranges, and rather poor oranges, too.

Three cross Atlantic, break record

By The Associated Press

ALMERE, Netherlands — With a crash landing here Tuesday, a Dutch couple and their fighter pilot companion shattered the record for crossing the Atlantic in a balloon.

The gondola of the "Dutch Viking" balloon slammed to the ground at 30 miles per hour, bounced and flipped over in a wheat field outside this Dutch village 51 hours and 14 minutes after leaving St. John's, Newfoundland. That time beat the previous record by almost 30 hours.

As Henk Brink, his wife Evelien and Royal Dutch Air Force Major Willem Hageman crossed the Dutch coastline early Tuesday after a smooth and cloudless ocean crossing, turbulence knocked their 158-foot-tall craft out of control, plunging it to an altitude of a few hundred feet.

Flight commander Brink, a veteran balloonist, told a news conference that the turbulence blew their gas burner flame away from the mouth of the hot air-and helium-filled balloon, whose buoyancy depends on heating the gases inside.

"We threw out all the ballast we had," Evelien Brink said at the news conference at Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport. "It was scary, but we reacted right."

"We were at that time really in a big emergency...we were fighting for our lives," Hageman said. "Just coasting in, for a couple of seconds we had nothing under control."

They were plagued by high winds for the next 25 miles before the jarring touchdown.

Their landing, about 12 miles east of Amsterdam, marked the first successful trans-Atlantic balloon crossing by Europeans and the first such crossing by a woman.

The two other successful trans-Atlantic balloon crossings were made by Americans.

The Dutch Viking flight will be long-remembered in the coastal town of Velsen, where some of the jettisoned lead-filled ballast bags weighing 22 pounds each smashed through the roofs of three buildings. No one was injured.

Brink, 44, was slightly injured on landing when he jumped from the gondola just before it hit the ground.

"This was horrible and I'll never do it again," his 31-year-old wife told reporters shortly after the landing.

The Dutch Viking averaged about 49 miles per hour during the 2,540 mile flight, sailing above the Atlantic at about 12,500 feet, according to the ground monitoring station at Schiphol airport, which maintained radio contact with the crew.

studies," he said.

Five wings in the residence hall system are closed down, with other floors being utilized for other purposes. A wing normally accommodates between 40 and 60 students.

Moore Hall has 2½ floors devoted to conference-guest housing facilities this year. Campus visitors, prospective students and parents of the residents can stay in these facilities for a minimal charge, Felde said.

The conference-guest housing also will be used for conference groups, students in night classes or commuting students that are on campus once or twice a week, he said.

Because of the space availability in the residence halls, the housing system rented some double-occupancy rooms as single rooms, Felde said.

"We had probably 325 people purchase single rooms — for an additional cost — for the privacy, which is about double the number we had last year," Felde said. "It costs the department to use the additional spaces this way but it is better than closing down floors or, eventually, wings."

March 1979 accident at the Pennsylvania power plant.

The U.S. Department of Energy has contracted with GPU Nuclear Corp., the TMI operator, to move the fuel, which will be used in tests before being disposed.

Each shipment consists of one rail car carrying seven canisters of the fuel and metal debris.

Mannell said he hoped not to have any trouble this time with Nebraska Gov. Bob Kerrey, who ordered the first TMI train halted before it reached the Nebraska border late on the night of July 22.

"We talked to the state of Nebraska and told them it was coming and apparently there won't be any problems this time," Mannell said. "That was quite a surprise last time."

Handicap elevator construction begins

By RENEE BEAUDOIN
Business Editor

University Facilities employees have started preparations for the construction of an elevator at Anderson Hall to make the building handicap accessible.

"As of now, we're only involved in digging out the dirt around the area to the level of the foundations. The contractor will dig out the dirt for the actual construction," said Fred Ferguson, director of University Facilities.

University employees will excavate the area of excess dirt before the contractor will come in and begin construction.

"As of right now it has to be dug out by hand. That's why we're letting the contractor do most of the work here," Ferguson said. "I'm sure they will come up with some type of machinery to mechanize the work.

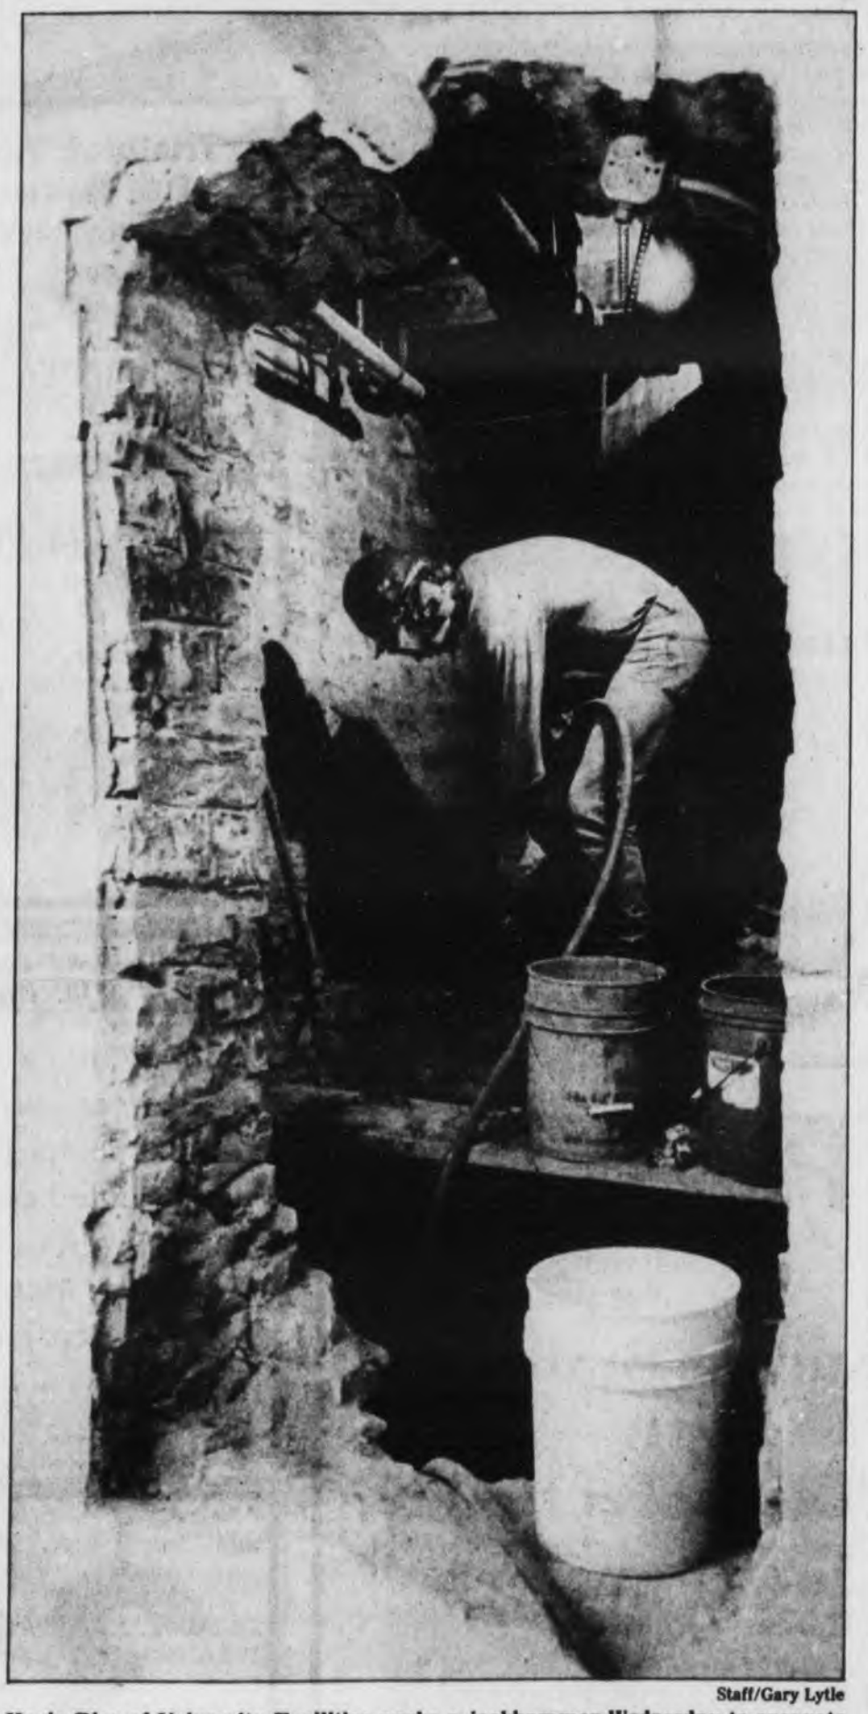
"If we were going to be working at it for more than a few weeks we would try to work something out. The main problem is that there is no room for him (the contractor) to do his job," Ferguson said.

University workers will be digging about 4 feet, which will yield an estimated 9 to 10 cubic yards of dirt.

Jim Shepard, associate University architect, said the total cost of construction is projected at $167,351. The estimate includes the elevator, a handicap ramp, renovation of the restrooms and drinking fountains, and the relocation of a guest restroom.

"Facilities will be removing a portion of the first floor and second floor so the elevator shaft can be installed," Shepard said. "We are having to excavate in an unexcavatable area for the area where the pit will be installed."

The pit of the elevator is the excess area in the shaft, beneath floor level for the mechanics of the elevator.



"Right now we're getting proposals from interested contractors," Shepard said. "We're really fast-tracking this job. We're doing some of the demolition and planning at the same time."

Student Senate passed a resolution last spring allocating $150,000 gained from the refinancing of existing student bonds to pay for the Anderson Hall elevator project. Shepard said the rest of the money will come from other areas.

"I would say the guest restroom would come out of other funds. Our main goal here was to design the elevator and the handicap ramp. However, we're ready to come up with the extra money to finish the job," Shepard said.

"I think the opening of Anderson to the handicapped is fantastic," said Gretchen Holden, coordinator for services for physically limited students. "But also, it will be a boon for the people who work in Anderson.

The projected completion date for construction is February 1987.

Hotel opens door to new program

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

Students interested in hotel management as a career will have a chance to gain hands-on experience if a new curriculum is added to the College of Human Ecology's restaurant management program.

"We're revamping the restaurant management program to include hotel management," said Charlie Partlow, instructor of dietetic, restaurant and institutional management.

Students would receive credit hours for working alongside management personnel and for the lecture time that would be included in the program, he said.

Partlow said they would get their hands-on experience at the Ramada Inn Motel, 17th Street and Anderson Avenue. Marriott Hotel Corp., owner of the Ramada Inn, has agreed to support the program.

In the hotel program, students would "see the job from a management point of view," Partlow said. This would include working at the front desk, checking guests in and out, and scheduling of the housekeeping personnel.

"Managers need to know how to do all the jobs in the hospitality industry" because they may be called upon to fill in and perform those duties at times, he said.

Partlow defined the "hospitality industry" as "the reception and entertainment of groups, guests and strangers with liberality and goodwill, offering food and shelter."

As an example of the material in the lecture portion of the program, Partlow said students would learn the different departments of a hotel and their functions and interactions.

The program will give students a lot of good experience, Partlow said. He said he hopes it will also open up possibilities of internships for students in the hotel industry.

A similar program in restaurant management is already available to students at the Holiday Inn, 530 Richards Drive, said Partlow, who is director of the restaurant management program.

Students in this program work in three different types of food service systems restaurants, he said, rotating between restaurants like Burgundy's Restaurant Club or the Plum Tree both in the Holiday Inn; Sirloin Stockade, 100 Bluemont Ave.; and Kramer Food Center, Partlow said.

Working in four week stints, participants in the program are exposed to a wide range of work in restaurant management.

Partlow said students work with a variety of menus, including planning menus, arranging banquets, catering and cost analysis. At times, students have even bused tables.

Soviets disregard offer of U.S. grain contract

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A month has passed since President Reagan's controversial decision to offer wheat to the Soviet Union at cut-rate prices, but Moscow so far has ignored the offer and time is running out.

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., a critic of the proposed sale, said the situation is embarrassing for the United States. He said the administration cut the price even more last Friday, which "demeans the process further."

To encourage the Soviets to buy 4 million metric tons of wheat under a previously arranged grain deal, the president announced on Aug. 1 that he had decided to grant a $13 per ton subsidy, meaning that American wheat would cost less in the Soviet Union than in the United States.

The subsidy, which is paid by the American taxpayer, was increased to $15 ton on Friday. The aim was to reduce the price to the world level.

In justifying approval of the deal, Reagan said the subsidy would help hard-pressed American wheat growers sell their surpluses. He was encouraged to take the action by Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, R-Kan.

However, senior members of the administration, including Secretary of State George Shultz, publicly criticized the deal as making no sense.

Shultz said the Soviets must be "chortling and scratching their heads about a system that says we're going to fix it up so that American taxpayers make it possible for a Soviet housewife to buy American-produced food at prices lower than an American housewife."

Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, was among lawmakers who were opposed, and he said Tuesday that he had not changed his mind.

The two nations are in the third year of a five-year grain purchase agreement. If the Soviets haven't purchased the wheat by Sept. 30, the expiration of fiscal 1986 in the United States budgeting process, and the discount sales opportunity will have passed the

Iranians chase, search two Soviet ships

By The Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — Iran stopped two Soviet ships in the first action against Iraq's main arms supplier since the Iranian navy began searching freighters for military cargo early last year, shipping sources said Wednesday.

Iranian warships chased the Pyotr Yemtsov in the southern Persian Gulf on Tuesday, then forced it into the Iranian port of Bandar Abbas to be searched.

Shipping executives, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the second vessel was stopped briefly Wednesday and identified only as the Tutov.

The Pyotr Yemtsov, which belongs to U.S.S.R.-Black Sea Shipping of Odessa, was seized during a voyage from the Black Sea port of Nikolayev to Kuwait and was being unloaded Wednesday at Bandar Abbas, according to the reports.

In Moscow, Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady I. Gerasimov confirmed that the 11,750-ton Pyotr Yemtsov was "detained" off the coast of the United Arab Emirates but did not mention the Tutov. Bandar Abbas is about 120 miles east of the U.A.E.

Gerasimov said he believed the freighter was carrying a load of cement. He gave no information on the size of its crew.

Despite the Soviet role in supplying Iraq during the 6-year-old Iran-Iraq war, shipping sources said weapons or other military goods were unlikely to be shipped on Soviet freighters through the Persian Gulf.

"We believe the Pyotr Yemtsov was loaded with construction material, but the Iranians consider such commodities to be an asset for the Iraqi military effort," said an executive based in Kuwait.

He noted that several Kuwaiti vessels had been intercepted and their cargoes of steel rods and other construction materials seized.

Scores of ships of many nationalities are known to have been searched since Iran began intercepting commercial vessels early in 1985.

Capt. Mohammed Hussein Malekzadegan, the Iranian navy commander, was quoted earlier this Jewish farm activist analyzes ag situation

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Many minorities, including Jews, are being blamed for the foreclosure of farms, said David Goldstein, developer of the Jewish Community Farm Crisis Bureau.

The organization was established to combat the anti-Semitism which has arisen during the farm crisis, Goldstein said while speaking to about 30 persons Wednesday night in Union 212.

He said there is a false stereotype that "Jews control everything, government, banks...and are greedy and are to blame for (the) farm crisis."

Goldstein said there are two kinds of extremists, the first being those who express hatred against minorities and government while exploiting the farm crisis. The second group consists of those who, while being influenced by the first, are actually seeking to help farmers.

After learning about what was happening to farmers, the group began programs to help them, he said.

"We vowed to extend our concern beyond anti-Semitism and try to help alleviate problems of the farm crisis," he said. "We want to be part of the solution."

Goldstein said 30 groups on campus work to help farmers, including the College of Human Ecology, which provides family counseling for problems caused by the crisis.

Goldstein said the College of Agriculture also is helping the agricultural community.

He said there are other ways in which the University can provide assistance.

"I think it would be appropriate for the president of K-State to appoint a Kansas State University task force on extremism and the farm crisis," he said.

As an example, Goldstein said students could walk from Manhattan to Topeka to dramatize the issues.

"You can stop at the homes of farm families having a tough time and let media hear what's really happening," he said.

Bus line to curtail service to Midwest

Most Kansas routes to be abandoned

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An executive of Trailways Lines Inc., of Dallas said Wednesday the company plans to drop service completely in six Midwestern states and abandon most of its routes in Kansas in an effort to stay afloat financially.

Malcolm Myers, Trailways' vice president for traffic, said his company, which is the largest provider of bus service in the state, has asked the Kansas Corporation Commission for permission to eliminate bus service to 57 Kansas communities effective April 1, 1987.

Under its plan, Trailways would drop all routes in Kansas except one running from Kansas City to Wichita via Lawrence, Topeka, Emporia and Augusta. The route also travels through Winfield and Arkansas City on its way to Oklahoma City, Okla.

In addition to the cutbacks, Myers said Trailways has announced it wants to eliminate all bus service to Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, Nebraska, South Dakota and Illinois.

"It's simply an economic situation," Myers said from his Dallas office. "The bus business has been deteriorating for several years but in the las few months that deterioration has accelerated very rapidly. We're simply seeking survival through curtailment."

The staff of the corporation commission is concerned with Trailways' plan because it would leave the bulk of the state without bus transportation. The commission is expected to act on the requests by December.

Steve Menaugh, spokesman for the commission, said the company sent a letter to the three-member regulatory board last Friday outlining its plan.

"In effect, Trailways wants to abandon most of the state, which would leave about 57 cities without bus service," Menaugh said. "They gave no reasons for the request in their letter and our staff considers the filing very poor and is considering seeking a more complete request."

Here is a list of the routes to be

Despite ban, mass funeral occurs

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Anti-apartheid leaders said a mass funeral for 20 blacks killed by police in Soweto would be held Wednesday in defiance of an official ban.

The government issued tough new press restrictions to make sure journalists could not cover it.

Families of some of those killed in the violence that swept parts of Soweto on Aug. 26-27 were called to police offices Wednesday and told to shun the mass funeral scheduled for a stadium near the White City neighborhood.

White City, so named because it is the best-lighted part of the huge black township outside Johannesburg, suffered the worst violence last week.

At least 20 people were shot dead by police in the Soweto outburst and a gang of young men hacked a black town councilor to death.

Leaders of anti-apartheid groups said they would go ahead with the funeral despite a Soweto police order Tuesday forbidding mass funerals of people killed by security forces. It says a service may be held for only one person and only 200 mourners may attend.

Soviets replace atomic agency head

MOSCOW — The Kremlin on Wednesday named nuclear power plant director Vadim Malyshev to replace the head of the atomic safety agency fired after the Chernobyl disaster.

The official news agency Tass said Malyshev, who for the past 13 years has directed the Beloyarsk nuclear power plant in the Ural Mountains near Sverdlovsk, was designated chairman of the state committee for safety in the atomic power industry.

Malyshev, 54, replaces Yevgeny V. Kulov, the highest-ranking government official dismissed as a result of the April 26 accident, which officials say killed 31 people and forced the evacuation of 135,000 residents living near the plant.

Soviet documents indicate the Beloyarsk plant has two graphite-moderated reactors, predecessors of the type that exploded at Chernobyl in the Ukraine.

Another veteran nuclear power plant manager, Nikolai Lukonin, was appointed in July to head the newly created Ministry of Atomic Energy.

Report details Soviet quake losses

MOSCOW — About 4,900 apartment buildings and 45,000 houses were damaged in Moldavia by an earthquake and a strong aftershock this week, the government newspaper Izvestia said Wednesday.

The article was the most detailed report of damage from the quake, which rocked the Balkans and part of the Soviet Union early Sunday morning.

It was the first mention of an aftershock Tuesday morning in Moldavia, which Izvestia said registered force 5 on the Soviet scale.

On the Soviet scale, a magnitude 5 aftershock is capable of "shaking buildings, cracking glass and plaster and waking sleepers," according to a Soviet encyclopedia.

Sunday's quake, which was centered in Romania about 120 miles west of the Moldavian capitol of Kishinev, registered force 8 on the Soviet scale, making it capable of heavy damage.

At its epicenter north of Bucharest, it registered 6.5 on the Richter scale of ground motion. An earthquake of magnitude 6 on the Richter scale can cause severe damage and a magnitude 7 quake is capable of widespread, heavy damage.

Izvestia said damage to the houses and apartment buildings ranged from cracks to demolition. The newspaper did not say how many of the 45,000 houses and 4,900 buildings were destroyed.

Challenger disaster forces layoffs

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — As many as 1,000 space workers here are expected to receive layoff notices within a few days because of a slowdown in activity resulting from the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger, industry sources said Wednesday.

Those losing jobs will be contractor personnel working on the shuttle processing contract. They are employed by Lockheed Space Operations Co., Grumman Technical Services Co., Morton Thiokol Inc. and Pan Am World Services Inc.

Other Kennedy Space Center contractors also are expected to reduce their work forces before the new fiscal year begins Oct. 1, said the sources, who spoke on condition they not be identified.

Lockheed spokesman John Williams said any announcements concerning layoffs would have to come from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

NASA said only that the companies are working on reducing their staffs to match requirements of the agency's fiscal 1987 budget.

No NASA employees are expected to be laid off.

Historic hotel violates sewage laws

TOPEKA — The owners of the historic Brookville Hotel, about 15 miles west of Salina, have been assessed a $500 fine in connection with alleged violations of the hotel's state sewer discharge permit.

Bob Moody, a spokesman for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, said the agency levied the fine after tests showed the hotel's sewer facility repeatedly failed to treat sewage to the standards mandated on the hotel's water pollution control permit.

"Additionally, monitoring data of the treated wastewater has not been routinely submitted to KDHE as required by the permit," Moody said. "During a 23-week period from Oct. 21, 1985 through March 31, 1986, permit limitations were exceeded eight times and monitoring results for 11 weeks were not submitted to KDHE."

Moody said the hotel, which contains a nationally recognized restaurant, was in compliance with terms of its permit only four of the 23 weeks.

In addition to the $500 fine, the Brookville Hotel will be required to submit plans to the health agency by Oct. 6 that show what changes would be made at its treatment facility to properly treat the sewage, Moody said.

The order levying the fine is subject to appeal to Secretary of Health and Environment Barbara J. Sabol, Moody said.

Court overturns toxic-shock ruling

WICHITA — The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Wednesday withdrew a decision it issued Tuesday that overturned a verdict by a federal jury in Wichita in a toxic-shock syndrome case, saying the opinion had been filed by mistake.

The written ruling sending the case back to U.S. District Court in Wichita for a new trial was "prematurely filed through a clerical error. It is being withdrawn," Robert Hoecker, clerk of the Denver-based court, told the Wichita Eagle-Beacon.

Hoecker said he did not know why the three judges who had issued the opinion decided to withdraw it or when they would file a replacement.

"It's a ray of hope. More than we had yesterday," said Wichita lawyer Mark Hutton, who represents the widower and two children of Betty O'Gilvie.

Soviet divers extend search for survivors

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The crews of both the crowded Soviet passenger liner and the freighter that rammed and sank it on a clear, calm night in the Black Sea knew they were on a collision course, accounts of the disaster indicated Wednesday.

Soviet authorities reported no new rescue of any of the 319 people missing in the Sunday night sinking of the cruise ship Admiral Nakhimov. There was little hope anyone still would be found alive.

Seventy-nine bodies were recovered and 836 people were plucked from the water after the ship, torn open by the freighter's bow, plunged to the bottom in about 15 minutes, too fast for the deployment of lifeboats.

Frogmen continued Wednesday to search the vessel, lying on its starboard side in 155 feet of water. Radio Moscow said more than 50 ships and a fleet of helicopters were searching the sea.

The last of the survivors, including most of the crew, were pulled from the sea Monday night, and maritime officials appeared pessimistic about the chances of survival for the missing.

"There are no new figures (on survivors) to report," Igor M. Averin, spokesman for the Merchant Marine Ministry, said Wednesday.

Deputy Merchant Marine Minister Leonid P. Nedyak told a news conference Tuesday that the Pyotr Vasyev rammed the Admiral Nakhimov with its prow, ripping a huge hole in the starboard midship between the engine room and boiler room.

Soviets say reporter smuggled jewelry

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The wife of an American reporter accused of spying said Wednesday that authorities have threatened to press smuggling charges over family jewelry that she and her husband failed to list on customs forms.

Nicholas Daniloff, correspondent for U.S. News & World Report, has been held without formal charges in east Moscow's Lefortovo Prison since Saturday. He was arrested by eight KGB agents after a Soviet acquaintance gave him a package later found to contain maps marked secret.

The chairman of U.S. News, Mortimer B. Zuckerman, left Moscow Wednesday after two days of meetings with Soviet officials aimed at winning Daniloff's release.

Zuckerman said his meetings were "productive in the sense of a dialogue, but not conclusive in the sense that I know what the outcome will be." He said he agreed not to say which officials he met.

Daniloff's wife, Ruth, said customs authorities called the Moscow office of U.S. News & World Report on Wednesday to say that she should come to a customs clearing house outside Moscow to sign a statement about the undeclared jewelry. "My instinct is just to ignore it (the message)," she said.

The Daniloffs listed carpets and a diamond ring as their only valuables when entering the country and when filling out forms to leave, Ruth said. Her husband took up the Moscow post 51&2 years ago and was planning on leaving soon for a new assignment in Washington.

Ruth said they did not list a pocket watch Daniloff's father gave him for his 21st birthday, a locket that belonged to Ruth's grandmother and some "rubbishy old jewelry" that she kept at the bottom of her jewelry box. She said they did not consider the items valuable or believe they were made of silver or gold.

Customs agents confiscated the seven or eight pieces of jewelry and have informed her they are being valued at $2,210, Ruth said.

"They're saying we have smuggled our own things into the country and now we're trying to smuggle them out again," she said. "It's all just so stupid. It may just be part of the harassment against us."

The Daniloffs sent their household goods to the customs house for clearance in late August, she said.

The Daniloff's 16-year-old son, Caleb, left Moscow on Wednesday to return to school in the United States.

"I think it's best for me to depart," Caleb said at the airport. "I don't really want to, but I think it would be better for my dad if there was no chance for them to hassle me, to make my dad do anything."

Ruth vowed to stay in Moscow until her husband is released, "unless they want to take me out of here in handcuffs, kicking and screaming."

She visited her husband Sunday and Monday and said she hoped to be allowed to see him again Friday.

Ruth has accused the KGB secret police of framing her husband in retaliation for the arrest in New York of a Soviet U.N. employee, Gennady Zakharov. Zakharov is jailed without bail pending trial on charges of spying.

Soviet Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov denied Tuesday that Daniloff's arrest was linked to the Zakharov case. Gerasimov said Daniloff was "caught red-handed" but a decision on whether to try him would not be made until an investigation is completed.

The Baltimore Sun, meanwhile, said U.S. officials were working on a plan to gain Daniloff's freedom by temporarily releasing Zakharov to the custody of the Soviet ambassador, who would guarantee the U.N. employee's appearance in court.

Even today, there are still a few students who don't have an HP calculator.

Burning the midnight oil may be necessary.
Burning the 2:00 or 3:00 or 4:00 AM oil is absurd.
Especially when an HP calculator can get the answers you want — in time to get a good night's sleep.
For instance, our HP-15C Professional Scientific Calculator has more built-in advanced math and statistical power than any other calculator. Our HP-41 Advanced Scientific Calculators have even more potential.
That's because there are better than 2500 software packages available for them — more than for any other calculator.
There's even a special plug-in software package (we call it the Advantage Module) that's designed to handle the specific problems an engineering student has to solve in his, or her, course work.
No wonder professionals in engineering and the physical sciences widely regard HP calculators as the best you can get.
So check one out. Then, when your mother calls to ask if you're getting enough sleep, you won't have to lie.
By the way, if you want more information, just give us a call at 800-FOR-HPPC. Ask for Dept. 658C.

Airplane traffic needs more safety controls

If an airplane suddenly appears in your den while you are watching television, whom do you blame? Who is to blame for the 16 houses that burned, not to mention the lives of 67 people aboard airplanes that crashed Sunday in Cerritos, Calif.?

We could blame either of the pilots for not being careful. But they cannot be responsible for watching traffic moving at the high rate of speed at which airplanes travel.

The blame could also be placed on regulation codes for small planes. The small plane involved in the wreck had a device that could broadcast its position, but officials do not know if the transponder was working or even turned on. Whatever the case, it didn't seem to work.

The next area to look at is the popular scapegoats of recent air accidents — air traffic controllers. They have "the most stressful job on earth." If they are overstressed and overworked, then maybe something needs to be done about their jobs.

Stress may cause them to overlook potential problems, which in turn may cause the deaths of innocent people. People in the airplanes knew they were taking a risk by flying, but what about those sitting at home unaware that a plane crash was going to take place overhead and fall into their homes?

It seems to take a major tragedy to get the public and the lawmakers to take action and do something about potentially dangerous situations.

Reducing stress on air traffic controllers and improving communication between non-commercial airplanes and flight control towers are two places to start improving this particular dangerous situation.

Reagan primes public for battle with Libya

If you missed out on last April's bombing of Libya, just wait. President Reagan and Col. Moammar Gadhafi appear to be giving us a carbon copy of the confrontation for this fall.

After several months of near silence between Reagan and Gadhafi, the two are back at each other's throat. When the United States became suspicious of Libyan officials planning new terrorist activities, an American diplomat told a Libyan official that if they don't stop, "we're going to pound the hell out of you." Gadhafi returned the verbal fire last week by calling Reagan "mad" and "another Hitler."

A sense of deja vu can be felt as U.S. aircraft carrier Forrestal is positioned off the the Libyan coast while the Reagan administration waits for a Gadhafi connection to a terrorist incident to prove what even the White House admits is sketchy evidence of Libyan terrorist plans.

Reagan is not the only one intent on destroying the Gadhafi regime. So are most Americans who witnessed through the media the killing of their countrymen at the hands of Arab terrorists and have heard Gadhafi's threats to spread terrorism into the United States.

The president is capitalizing on public disgust of Gadhafi and his threats by waving the bloody flag of Libya's past to gain public support for another attack. If Reagan can get public support for another attack, he is going to use this support to encourage dissidents in Libya to overthrow their leader.

Since the bombing in April, indications show that the military leaders of that country have become uneasy about Gadhafi's willingness to confront the U.S. military. Knowing this, Reagan is sending signals to the Libyan people to provoke them into a coup attempt.

If Gadhafi continues to take the path he has in the past, it will be only a matter of time before we see a repeat of April 15. Stay tuned as the saga continues.

Co-op uncooperative

Editor,

I feel that the KSU Child Care Cooperative has failed to meet its commitment to provide my children with care, although I have consistently met all of their requirements.

The staff of the cooperative assured me, as late as the end of the summer semester, that my two children, ages 1 and 3, would continue to have places at the cooperative for the fall semester for the same Monday, Wednesday and Friday full-day programs they had participated in during the summer semester.

Because I would be late beginning school after my return from an Army Reserve active duty, my children were scheduled to begin on Aug. 27. I was notified Aug. 25 by the director of the cooperative that unless I could increase my children's participation to five full days a week or accept a makeshift schedule of different classes that did not cover my class and student work schedule, my children would not be able to participate in the cooperative program this fall.

I realize there must have been valid reasons for the emergency board meeting Aug. 15 that determined that only 10 percent of the children in the 1- to 1½-year age group could be provided less than full-time care. However, I consider it very poor business practice to renege on arrangements that were made prior to that decision.

I feel that I was "dumped." Just two days before I needed child care, I had to begin the difficult process of locating competent child care that would fit my schedule. Additionally, I had to explain to my 3-year-old daughter why she would not be going to her beloved "school" again, after I had just reassured her that she would be returning in two days.

I cannot fault the cooperative's program, which I have found to be excellent. However, I believe that this one decision, poorly considered, sets a precedent which leaves every student, staff or employee depending on the cooperative in a very vulnerable position. The cooperative requires us to pay in advance, provide notice of our intention to leave and charges us even if our children are too ill to attend. Yet, we cannot count on them to honor their commitments to provide consistent child care.

I hope this decision will be reviewed and considered before any similar decisions are made in the future. For my family, it is too late. I have committed myself to other arrangements and I take my commitments seriously.

Election raises death sentence issue

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

With elections coming up in a couple of months, it's time to examine some of the issues surrounding the governor's race. Let's see — they both want to help the farmers, they both want to help the Kansas economy, and they both want to make Kansas a better place to live. Big deal. These campaign promises are older than Alf Landon. Then to my very mild surprise, a real issue actually emerged from the dusty old campaign promises — capital punishment.

The death penalty has been around for a long time. It has been the mode of punishment for crimes from murder to adultery. Killing someone as punishment for crime is fast becoming outdated. Most countries in the world have discontinued this form of punishment. In fact, the only industrialized nations that still have the death penalty are the United States and the Soviet Union (superpower sickness, perhaps?).

The United States has had the death penalty from the beginning, except for a brief period in the 1970s when the U.S. Supreme Court debated whether it was being applied fairly. Since then, they've decided several cases that have cleared the way for the death penalty to be used again, and now the number of executions is increasing.

The question of whether this practice is good or bad still remains. People have been arguing about this for years. The pro-death people claim capital punishment is cheap and has a deterring effect on the rest of the population. The other side counters, saying it is actually cheaper to imprison someone for life than to execute them. They also say that the deterrent is negligible, citing that the two states with the highest per capita murder rates, Texas and Florida, also execute people regularly.

The question of capital punishment's deterring effect is intriguing. To answer it, you must be able to see the thoughts that go through a killer's mind. First, few people facing the death penalty ever realize what the penalty is. Most of the people sentenced to death never really set out to kill anybody.

Most of them killed someone while committing another crime, such as armed robbery. The robber is nervous and scared, something unexpected happens, and bang — someone dies. This kind of person would never be deterred because he hasn't the time to think about the punishment. That comes after he pulls the trigger. Then he becomes more dangerous because he is then fighting for his life, and he may not hesitate to take a few policemen or innocent bystanders along with him. No one gives up his or her life without a fight.

Another question brought up by this issue is that of executing innocent people. If you throw someone in prison and find out later he or she are innocent, you can let them out and correct your mistake. But if you execute them, it will take Dr. Frankenstein to correct your mistake. You have just murdered an innocent person.

Some of you probably think that our system of justice doesn't make mistakes like this. Death row inmates are given almost every opportunity to appeal the decision and acquire stays of execution, which accounts for the added cost of executing people as compared to life imprisonment. But even with these safeguards, many innocent people have been executed in the United States. There are 65 such cases cited in Professor Edwin Borchard's book, Convicting the Innocent. Our justice system simply is not perfect.

Just take a look at any murder case. Examine the evidence available. Then try to imagine any possible way that it could have been done by someone other than the person on trial. Even if the crime was videotaped and witnessed by a thousand people, you might still have room for doubt. While the chances for this kind possibility are sometimes small, the chances of a person surviving a lethal injection are even smaller. The odds will catch you sooner or later.

When the issue of capital punishment arises in your life, just remember the consequences of your decision. You could be the person they strap to the table, and you had better hope the injection is as imperfect as the people who are giving it to you.

East Berlin opens westerner's eyes

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

Despite warnings of terrorist activities, radiation from Chernobyl and even more importantly — an ever-falling U.S. dollar, I visited the divided city of Berlin earlier this summer.

Always a center of media attention, Berlin and its 28-mile long wall, which turned 25 years old last month, give a visitor a sense of history in the making.

This summer has been rich with examples of Berlin's unique, bizarre and even tragic brand of history.

— On July 28, two days after I left the city, an unknown person or group of people detonated an explosive along the wall's west side. The blast blew a meter-wide hole in the concrete and steel structure, as well as shattering windows on the west side. No one was injured.

— On July 30, Heinz Braun, 48, allegedly dressed himself and three mannequins as Soviet soldiers, placed the mannequins in a car painted like a Soviet military vehicle and drove through Checkpoint Charlie unstopped by the East German border guards, thereby escaping to West Berlin. Braun even provided footage of the incident which raised both eyebrows and suspicions.

The West German government refused to confirm his story, while the East Germans denounced it as an out-and-out lie. As authorities discovered a week later, it was a lie. Braun, a member of "August 13," a West Berlin-based group that aids East Germans in escaping to the West, had created both the story and the footage to make the East Germans look bad. Unfortunately for Braun and August 13, his hoax backfired.

— On Aug. 13, East Berlin celebrated the 25th anniversary of the construction of the Berlin Wall, while protesters in West Berlin denounced the Great Guardian of Socialism as an obstruction to freedom.

— On Aug. 21, a 20-year-old West Berlin man rented a car and drove it into the wall at high speed. The car burst into flames, killing the driver. The wreckage remained on the strip of East German territory just west of the wall for more than an hour, while West Berlin officials waited for permission to tow it away.

My own memories of Berlin are far less serious. However, they still contain an element of the bizarre — especially the memory of an afternoon I spent in East Berlin. After a couple of bottles of East Berlin Pils, which is undoubtedly the worst beer I have ever tasted, I found myself in dire need of a men's room.

Although I was near the Brandenberg Gate, a popular tourist area, it is not ideally suited for tourists — especially those in my situation. The buildings in that area are almost exclusively embassies and book stores — neither a prime candidate for the solution to my problem.

I made my way to a public facility that I had seen earlier. What I had not seen earlier were the steel bars that blocked the entryway. So much for public restrooms in East Berlin.

With urgency overcoming shyness, I asked one of the dozens of policemen that patrol the area. He pointed and gave me directions to the public restroom I had just been to. I politely thanked him and hurried in the opposite direction.

In one bold stroke, I decided to end my torment. The American Embassy was nearby. I knew my countrymen would be sympathetic to my cause. The only problem was that I could not remember where it was. (I later discovered that it was only a block away.) But there was no time to look; I decided to make due with what I could find.

I circled the city block once, surveying my prospects as I went. I immediately eliminated the idea of seeking help at the Soviet, Syrian, Polish, Hungarian and Mongolian embassies. That left Finland, Japan, Turkey, Spain, Sudan, the Netherlands, India and Austria. I chose the Austrian Embassy because of its officially neutral, yet generally pro-western stance. Besides, it was the closest one.

I bolted inside and found no one there, not even a guard to protect the diplomats. I knocked on doors and climbed three flights of stairs before I noticed videotape cameras on the ceiling watching me. Finally, a man emerged from a door and acted surprised to see me. I skipped introductory amenities and told him I was in desperate need of help, which by this time I was.

Probably expecting me to ask for political asylum, his tone turned serious as he asked me what I needed. I then asked him where the men's room was located. Trying to hide his laughter, he called someone on an intercom, explained my situation, gave me directions and bid me good day — smiling as he left. So much for my experience with international diplomacy east of the Berlin wall.

Many of the Germans I spoke with this summer felt that someday the wall would come down, and eventually the two Germanies would be reunited.

I also spoke with Heinz Bulmahn, associate professor of modern languages, who has family and friends living in East Germany. Professor Bulmahn said, "Every German in the West would like to see the wall come down. I hate that wall."

However, he also added that the wall would remain indefinitely, citing as reasons not only Soviet imperialism, but the stark political, social and economic differences that have developed between the two Germanys since the end of World War II. Unfortunately for people who view the wall as tragic, Professor Bulmahn is probably right.

Physics department to break atoms

Federal grant funds ion beam machine

By MARY LYNN GATSCHET
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Physics plans to contribute to atomic research by completing a $1 million machine next year.

One year ago, the physics department received a grant from the U.S. Department of Energy to build a machine which can break down an atom, the smallest unit of a chemical element.

This device, called a CRYEBIS, "shoots" off most or all of an atom's electrons, leaving a highly charged ion. CYREBIS is short for cryogenic electron beam ion source.

"The sole purpose of this ion source is to produce and spit out atomic particles," said Lewis Cocke, professor of physics.

The Department of Energy's interests in such a machine lie in the fact that this machine facilitates the study of ions. In learning more about ions, scientists can understand what would happen in a nuclear fusion reactor, should one ever be built.

In theory, nuclear fusion reactors, as opposed to today's nuclear fission reactors, would not produce radioactive nuclear waste. In fusion, two unstable ions are fused together to make a stable atom. Energy is released and harnessed when the ions are fused. In fission, however, the atom is split, leaving behind radioactive waste.

Cocke said the CRYEBIS functions in this manner: An extremely intense electron beam is shot through a magnetic field made from a superconducting magnet. In order to make the magnet superconducting, it must be kept at 4 degrees Kelvin, approximately minus 420 degrees Fahrenheit.

At this stage, the cylinder, through which the electron beam is shot and which contains the magnetic field, becomes a vacuum. The extremely cold surface acts as a "pump," forcing almost all molecules within the cylinder to stick against its walls, creating a near-perfect vacuum.

At this point, the electron beam is shot through the vacuum and hits an isolated atom, "like machine-gun fire knocking off all the electrons of the atom, creating an ion," Cocke said.

"Now comes the question, what do we do with it? We take these ions and bombard other things with it."

These things can be any type of gas, liquid, or solid. It is this collision process in which Cocke and his associates are interested.

"We are interested in such things because they do occur in nature, in situations where we would like to find out how they work," Cocke said. "Fusion is one example of something we would like to understand more."

Kansas bench to see first all-woman court

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas will have its first all-woman appellate court hearing panel next week when Court of Appeals Judge Mary Beck Briscoe teams with two female district court judges to hear arguments in 12 cases.

Chief Judge Bob Abbott said Wednesday that Briscoe will be joined on the bench by Judges Janice D. Russell, of Olathe, and Jean F. Shepherd, of Lawrence. The hearing panel will sit in Wichita to hear the dozen appeals.

The two district court judges are among 10 selected to sit with the seven Court of Appeals judges in September in an effort to reduce the caseload facing the appeals court.

Since January, the appeals court has enlisted the help of 40 district court judges and two retired jurists in its efforts to keep up with the growing list of appeals. Some 561 appeals have been resolved this year with the additional judges.

Coalition hardens attack on Rehnquist

Report cites resistance to equal justice

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's major civil rights coalition stepped up its attack Wednesday on Chief Justice-designate William H. Rehnquist, arguing in a report that he has opposed equal justice for minorities "at every turn."

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights issued its report a week before the scheduled Senate debate on the nominations of Rehnquist and of Antonin Scalia as a Supreme Court associate justice.

While the report covered many of the criticisms leveled at Rehnquist during his confirmation hearings in August, it was characterized by its use of harsh language.

The Leadership Conference, composed of 185 organizations, said its main reason for opposing Rehnquist's nomination "is his 35-year record of opposition to the fundamental principle of equal justice under law."

The coalition also contended "he lacks the requisite candor and sense of propriety to serve in the nation's highest judicial post."

Supreme Court spokeswoman Toni House said there would be no comment on the study, entitled "The Case Against William Rehnquist: A 35-Year History of Hostility to Victims of Discrimination and Unanswered Questions of Candor and Sense of Propriety."

The report reviewed Rehnquist's career as a private citizen, a Justice Department official during the Nixon administration and as an associate justice of the Supreme Court the past 15 years.

"He has opposed fair and equal treatment of minorities at every turn: in the legislature (where he opposed local public accommodations laws), at the polls (where he sought to block blacks and Hispanics from voting), and in his personal dealings (where he accepted racial and religious restrictive covenants on his real estate holdings)," the report said.

"As times changed and a consensus for civil rights emerged among the American people, Mr. Rehnquist has sought to put a more benign face on his previous statements and actions. But his explanations are contradicted by others and by common sense," it added.

Much of the study covered Rehnquist's record on issues such as school desegregation, voting rights, public accommodations and racial makeup of juries.

Under a section entitled "Candor and Sense of Propriety," the report cited Rehnquist's failure to disqualify himself from a challenge to the Army's former domestic surveillance program. It said Rehnquist "prejudged the case" and "neglected to acknowledge" his role in formulating the program — a role the justice has denied ever playing.

Reflecting on Rehnquist's early career, the report cited his oft-quoted memorandum while a Supreme Court law clerk in 1952 to Justice Robert Jackson.

The memo defended the 1896 court decision accepting "separate but equal" facilities for blacks. Rehnquist told the Senate that it represented the views of Jackson, not his own.

However, Jackson's secretary at the time, Elsie Douglas, wrote a senator on Aug. 8 that Rehnquist's recollection was wrong.

A few years after writing the memo, the report said, Rehnquist opposed a Phoenix school desegregation plan and wrote a local newspaper that "we are no more dedicated to an 'integrated' society than we are to a 'segregated' society."

House to reorganize, investigate resources

By The Collegian Staff

Alpha Kappa Lambda will retain status as a fraternity at K-State, but the chapter house will be closed during the academic year for reorganization and renovation.

The chapter is reorganizing to strengthen the financial status of the house and to analyze problems that the house has not been able to deal with properly, said Les Longberg, president of the Alpha Kappa Lambda Corporate Board.

The chapter will hire a full-time coordinator to live in the house and implement the reorganization. He will begin his duties at the start of the spring semester and be in charge of a colony rush, he said.

"We still have a chapter. We are only reorganizing. We have had people moving out before they were a junior or senior, and this made it tough on the younger guys to run the house," Longberg said. "We are going to do a lot of renovation to strengthen the house during the academic year."

AKL is a member of Interfraternity Council and will continue to hold chapter meetings during the year. The house will not participate in intramurals this year, he said.

Washburn target of discrimination suit

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A Topeka family law firm which has had differences with Washburn University filed two suits against the school in federal court this week on behalf of a professor and five suspended football players.

The Phelps firm filed suit in U.S. District Court Wednesday on behalf of Robert William Piatt Jr., a Washburn law professor who said he was berated by an associate dean after he allowed a member of the Phelps family to enroll in his law clinic.

A suit was filed against the university Tuesday for five black football players who were dismissed from the team after participating in a boycott during practice last week to protest allegations of discrimination.

Piatt claimed breach of contract and impairment of his professional career in his suit. He contended that he was removed as a member of Washburn's student recruitment and financial aid committees because he provided affidavits in support of the Phelpses in a case against the university. Margie Phelps, a spokeswoman for the family firm, said he is seeking in excess of $10,000 in actual and punitive damages.

The five football players were among 22 black players who boycotted practice at Washburn last week because of what they said were unfulfilled oral scholarship promises.

The suit alleged they were kicked off the team after writing a letter to the university president complaining of "discrimination on the field...a system where black athletes cannot achieve equity...and continued mental and character destruction."

Other players engaged in the boycott were reinstated after a meeting last weekend but were told they would have to miss Washburn's game this weekend. The five players who remained off the team — all juniors and seniors — were Eugene Battle, Jamestown, N.Y.; Randy Craven, Denver; Vernon Hysaw, Denver; Neils Chapman, U.S. Virgin Islands, and Tony McDonald, Manhattan.

Phelps said the five athletes each seek actual damages of $135,000 and punitive damages of $285,000.

Washburn has been the target in recent years of four federal lawsuits filed by the Phelps-Chartered firm alleging that the Washburn Law School unfairly denied admission to three members of the Phelps family. The Phelpses alleged that the school's actions stemmed solely from the family firm's reputation for handling controversial civil rights legislation.

Three of the four suits have been dismissed, the most recent just two weeks ago.

K-State Sailing and Blue Valley Yacht club members begin their biannual race Sunday on Tuttle Creek Reservoir. The 13 boats began at the Tuttle Cove, sailed to the Randolph bridge, then returned to finish the race.

Members of the Kansas State Sailing Club joined members of the Blue Valley Yacht Club Sunday for their biannual long-distance race on Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

The racers began at Tuttle Cove, went around the Randolph bridge and returned to the starting point — a 30-mile round trip.

"Everyone had a really good time," said Jeff Oaklief, president of the K-State club. "After the race, everyone gets to give their excuses about why they came in so far behind."

Thirteen boats competed in the race, which was based on a handicap system designed to compensate for different designs of boats. Boats designed to be faster receive minutes in addition to their actual time.

After a brief shower, the weather conditions were "delightful," said Marty Ottenheimer, adviser to the K-State club.

"It was mostly sunny, and (there were) shifting winds which made it interesting. It tested the skippers' abilities," Ottenheimer said.

Plaques were awarded to the top four finishers, as well as a "Diehard Award" to the boat finishing last.

The Hobie 16, which was skippered by Brad Stowe, reached the finish line first with a time of 3:20. Stowe also finished first when handicaps were added to actual times.

Stowe, who has competed on a national basis, said he enjoys sailing Hobie crafts because of their speed capabilities. But he added that Hobies are more difficult to control than other crafts.

"They're nowhere near as maneuverable as a single-hulled sailboat because they don't have a pivot point. Nothing is stuck down in the water to turn with," Stowe said.

"Because of the amount of sail compared to the amount of boat in the water, a lot of leverage is required to keep it from tipping over. You have to lean out of the boat a lot of the time," he said.

The second- and third-place boats finished only six seconds apart, once the handicaps were added. The Irwin 25, skippered by Jim Young, came in just ahead of Marty Ottenheimer and the J-24.

Chugging in after 5 hours and 46 minutes was the FJ, skippered by Oaklief's father, Charles, who garnered the Diehard Award for his performance.

The popularity of sailing has increased tremendously in recent years, said Ottenheimer, a member of the Blue Valley club for the past decade.

"According to the statistics, whoever takes the statistics, sailing is the second fastest-growing sport, only behind skiing," said Ottenheimer.

"The allure for the students is that for very little money you can get into one of the fastest-growing sports in the country. You can have a good time. You can enjoy the weather," he said.

"It's a lot of fun. There's nothing quite like it," said the younger Oaklief, who began sailing at an early age with encouragement from his father. "It's not like a motorboat where you go out and it's noisy and you bounce around and pound waves. It's a lot smoother.

"It can be exciting, too," he added. "You can start to tip over and it kind of gets your heart going."

Ottenheimer, who has been a member of the Blue Valley club for about the past 10 years, said he believes sailing can be enjoyed by all types of people.

"No matter what size you are, no matter how old you are, you'll see people out here from seven to 70 racing and competing. You can find a boat that enables you to compete, and compete well," he said.

"You don't have to be big like you do in football to compete. You don't have to be tall like you do in basketball," he said. "But any individual can get into an outdoor sport that offers a great deal of fun. So I think that is the main advantage of sailing."

Ottenheimer said sailing does require a moderate amount of physical strength, as well as both intelligence and concentration.

"Sailing combines in a way that no other sport does...all three of the aspects that tax human beings — the physical aspect, the emotional aspect and the mental aspect of it," he said.

"Individuals who are, say, stronger than others can sometimes compensate over the other two factors. Likewise, someone who can concentrate more can compensate for the other factors. Therefore, almost any individual, no matter what his individual characteristics, can compete in sailboating," Ottenheimer said.

Oaklief said the initial fee to join the 30-plus member club is $25, which covers membership until May. He said the reason for the low fee is that much of the equipment has been donated to the club, which was founded in 1984.

"Our goal, besides getting people out to sail, is to get them interested in collegiate racing and improve their skills and their sailing knowledge," Oaklief said.

"We have people in the club from all kinds of different backgrounds, as far as knowledge about sailing is concerned. We have beginners and people that have sailed almost all their lives," he said.

Swede adusting to heat, humidity

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Somehow you just don't see the fiery competitor locked behind Anneli Edling's soft blue eyes or her flowing blonde hair that sits atop her tiny frame.

Edling, a freshman women's cross country runner from Falun, Sweden, comes to K-State with — what most coaches will joyously tell you — "unlimited potential." So far, Edling is living up to her informal billing as the next heir to the Jacque Struckhoff throne.

Edling has been at K-State all of two weeks, but already appears to have adjusted smoothly to American ways and into the University culture. And, she said, Manhattan is not much different from Sweden.

"I have been adjusting well," Edling said of her short stint at K-State. "The heat and humidity have been a little hard (to get used to). It will take about four weeks to get accustomed."

Becoming accustomed to K-State, or the United States in general, was a burden Edling welcomed with open arms. The soft-spoken import has dreamed of receiving her education and competing on the collegiate level in the United States since she was 14 years old.

That is when American universities and track coaches from near and far began their usual phone call and letter writing campaigns to lure the young Swede to their respective institutions.

"I received letters and phone calls from the States (starting) when I was 14," Edling said. "I always thought about coming here to compete because the competition is so much better than in Sweden. I had problems during high school with some injuries and I didn't think about it as much.

"There were some universities wanting me — Texas, Nebraska and some others. I didn't want to go South because of the heat so I chose here. Coach (John) Capriotti was very nice and they had some good runners. That was important to me."

As good a cross country runner as Edling panned out to be, she was equally talented in cross-country skiing. She said she worked just as hard and diligently tracking across the snow back home as she did running beside the Swedish mountainsides.

"I started cross-country skiing when I was 8 and finished when I was 16. I have competed in cross-country skiing as much as track," Edling said. "If you want to be good at running, you can't ski all winter."

Winter is the next time Edling will get to see home. She said she plans to go home for Christmas to be with her parents for a couple of weeks. However, Edling was warned all about "going away to college."

"I knew before I came I would be, what do you call it, homesick?" Edling said.

"I knew it would be tough, but, I like this place. It has good opportunities for training," she said.

Those training oppourtunities are being conducted under the watchful eye of first-year coach Capriotti. It was Capriotti who brought the Swedish talent to K-State along with fellow Swedish product Jan Jonsson.

"I don't know how good she is," said Capriotti, who is moving the team along slowly early on to avoid injuries. "She hasn't been taxed enough — she always says she doesn't get worked hard enough. She has been a welcome addition, especially if Jacque doesn't come back (from a leg injury last season)."

Edling has no regrets about coming halfway across the globe to compete in her favorite pastime and pursue her educational goals. She is even becoming acquainted to "a lot of fast food and junk food" found in abundance in the United States.

"I think you need to see what it (the rest of the world) is like," she said. "If you don't go and see you will never know."

NCAA penalizes 60 'Huskers

By The Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. — The NCAA has suspended 53 University of Nebraska football players for one game and seven others for two games and the Cornhuskers could possibly forfeit their season opener, Coach Tom Osborne said Wednesday.

Osborne told reporters after practice that the suspensions were ordered for what the NCAA said were improprieties in Nebraska's use of complimentary football tickets.

"We're naturally amazed and very angry about the whole thing," Osborne said. "We told the players we will do everything possible to appeal this."

Osborne said the eighth-ranked Cornhuskers could forfeit their season opener against 11th-ranked Florida State as one of the school's options to the suspensions.

The violations involved players allowing unauthorized people to use game passes. Family members and other students are the only people allowed to use players' passes, according to NCAA rules.

A Nebraska sports information office spokesman said the NCAA gave Nebraska two options:

— All the players could sit out Saturday's game against Florida State, which Osborne said would leave him with mainly freshmen and redshirt players to put on the field.

— Have 10 players sit out each of the next six or seven games.

Osborne said he learned of the suspensions from the NCAA's eligibility committee on Tuesday. He would not release a list of the players involved.

An NCAA spokesman said the association was not commenting on the matter.

"As far as I know, the matter is still being discussed," Jim Marchiony, director of media relations for the NCAA in Mission, Kan., said.

"Until I hear otherwise, we won't have any comment."

Nebraska is scheduled to meet the Seminoles in a nationally televised game Saturday night in Lincoln.

Osborne said using players who aren't ready to play would risk injuries to them and would humiliate Nebraska, Florida State and ABC, which will televise the game.

Jackson takes first Royal hit in stride

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — With Bo Jackson and Steve Carlton on center stage, the night was made for frisky rookies and aging greats.

Jackson, one of baseball's most heralded newcomer in years, got his first major league hit in his first major league at-bat. And he got it off Carlton, a dominant figure through parts of three decades, a winner now of 322 major league games.

"This was sort of a historic night," said Kansas City infielder Greg Pryor. "I've played in the World Series and I played in the Pine Tar Game. Now I can say I've seen it all."

It's unlikely anyone will long remember that Carlton's Chicago White Sox beat Jackson's fading Royals 3-0 Tuesday night. But trivia buffs may instantly recall the Hall of Fame pitcher Bo Jackson victimized for his first major league hit.

"One day he will look back and say he got his first hit off a Hall of Famer," Royals' interim manager Mike Ferraro said. "He can be proud of that."

Carlton, 18 years Jackson's senior, seemed to turn back the calendar in honor of the occasion, scattering seven hits through eight innings, striking out three and not walking a batter. Since being claimed on waivers from San Francisco Aug. 12, the Cy Young Award winner of the Philadelphia Phillies is 3-2.

"That was vintage Carlton," said White Sox Manager Jim Fregosi.

Jackson, who won the Heisman Trophy as a running back at Auburn last year and was the No. 1 pick in the NFL draft, was 1-for-3 in what almost turned out to be a spectacular debut. He came within a few inches of slugging a monstrous home run on his first at-bat and almost bounced into a triple play on his third.

After slugging a 425-foot foul shot almost to the top of the leftfield bleachers in the second inning, Jackson grounded a 2-2 pitch to the right side of the infield.

First baseman Russ Morman took himself out of the play trying to flag down the ball, which second baseman Tim Hulett stopped in short right field.

Then it became a footrace to the bag between Jackson and Carlton. The 23-year Jackson, who outran Southeastern Conference cornerbacks, had little trouble outrunning the 41-year-old pitcher.

Carlton won the next battle, getting Jackson to hit a simple grounder to the shortstop.

Then, about 30 minutes later, Steve Balboni and Frank White singled leading off the seventh.

The White Sox were leading 2-0. The crowd shouted, "Bo, Bo, Bo," in hopes of a three-run home run.

Jackson smashed Carlton's first pitch straight at third baseman Dave Cochrane, who was guarding the line. Cochrane stepped on third for the first out, then fired to Hulett for the second.

"When I hit it, I thought triple play," Jackson said. "I just gave it everything I had going down to first."

He got to the bag a half-step before Hulett's throw.

"I wasn't looking for anything spectacular to happen," he said. "I'm just happy to be playing."

Monument reveres America's farmers

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

BONNER SPRINGS — Protests or foreclosure auctions — or a combination of both — have characterized a good share of agricultural gatherings in recent years. But for several hundred, Labor Day was a time to honor farmers past, present and future.

Farmer Memorial Weekend, coinciding with Labor Day weekend, culminated at the Agriculture Hall of Fame and National Center with the dedication of the National Farmers Memorial.

Although representatives of the American Agriculture Movement were present with a silent protest against the lack of farmers' involvement in ceremonies, a common theme of the dedication was the assertion that family farming is not dead, and will not die.

Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, R-Kan., speaking to about 1,200 attending the ceremony, said the dedication of the three bronze relief panels in the memorial was "a major milestone for the hall of fame," adding there is "no better tribute to farming."

Dole acknowledged there is "a lot of uncertainty about the future," but said a long-range plan is necessary to form policy.

Quoting George Washington, Dole said farming is the "oldest and noblest of professions," adding that "there are no fewer obstacles but different challenges" to the farmers of today.

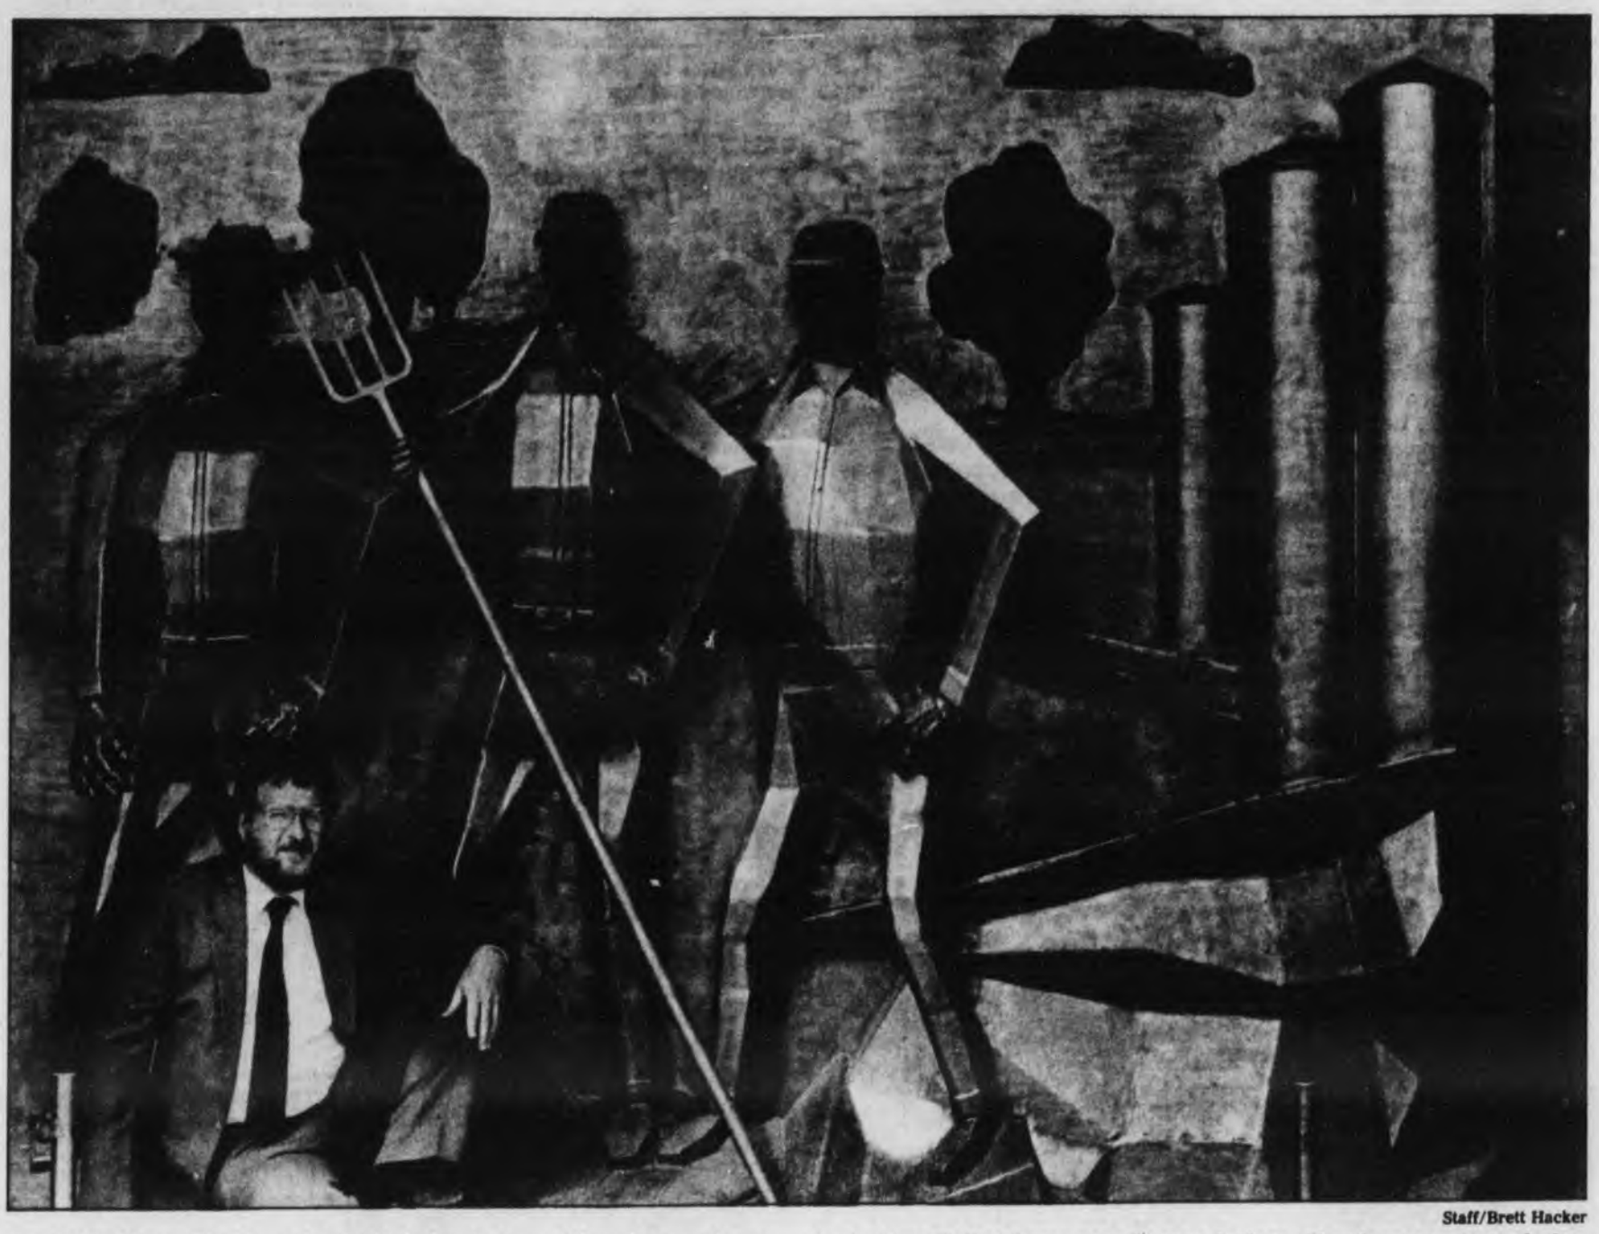
Among those challenges, he said, are droughts, floods, hail stones, insects — and contradictory governmental policies.

"We have to find a better way for American agriculture, as well as American consumers," Dole said.

He said it was understandable that farmers sometimes become defensive about support programs, but noted the sector is in a "transition period."

"We will have to spend a great deal of money to preserve the family farm as we know it," he said.

Consumers, he said, should realize subsidies to the American farmer are also beneficial to the consumer, allowing Americans to spend the lowest percentage of their incomes for food in the world.



Politicians should probably spend more time listening and less time talking, Dole said. Another problem is that individuals addressing the politicians believe they have found the correct answers — but then the next person also has the answer, he said.

"I understand (the farmers) frustration...but I think there is an answer," Dole said.

"If you don't eat, don't worry about the farmers," he said, but added that consumers should remember while shopping for groceries farmers would like to receive a fair price for their products.

Hall of Fame honors farming for 30 years

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

BONNER SPRINGS — In the late 1950s, a group of individuals in the Kansas City area decided to honor agriculture.

And Del Hininger, then an automobile dealer, was told to find some land or a "place to have some kind of a big deal," he recalls nearly 30 years later.

That "place" has become the Agricultural Hall of Fame and National Center, located within eyesight of Sandstone Amphitheater and the Kansas City Renaissance Festival site.

Hininger, a Bonner Springs resident now involved in real estate operations, bought the land in 1958. He first became a board member in 1960, after a formal organization was established.

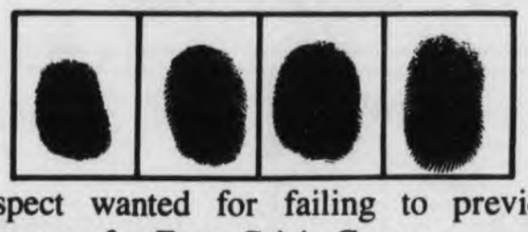
He said things "kind of broke down" for a time in the mid-60s, which resulted in his 30-month tenure as the hall's director from 1966 through 1968. Current director is Harold Adkins.

The hall was officially opened on June 12, 1965, with about 300 persons attending the ceremony. The grounds then included approximately 275 acres and one building. The hall was chartered by Congress as a U.S. shrine of agriculture in 1960.

Currently, the site includes the center, a museum of farming history, a relocated railroad depot, schoolhouse and a lake on the grounds, in addition to a farm memorial dedicated Monday.

According to Adkins, the memorial is the first national monument built outside Washington, D.C., and the first national monument ever built without using tax funds. It is also the first major monument dedicated to the American farmer.

Visitors can ride a scale-model replica of a Union Pacific diesel train around the facility's lake, leaving from the former Morris depot, which was closed in 1982, and later moved to the hall site.



There is also an agricultural library and theater, provided by the National Rural Electrification Cooperative Association on the grounds.

Inside the main building is the Hall of Fame to honor individuals instrumental in the development of agriculture. Among those honored include Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., Luther Burbank, George Washington Carver, Thomas Jefferson and Eli Whitney. Scheduled for 1987 induction is John Deere, with the date to coincide with the company's 150th anniversary.

Several corporations, including the Ford Motor Co. and Phillips Petroleum have contributed financial and material resources to the facility.

consists of a concrete-encased dome to be covered by granite panels. On the dome's open end are three separate bronze panels sculpted from a massive ship propeller.

The first of the 10-foot by 11-foot panels depicts an early-American farm family. In recognition of present-day agriculture, the center panel shows three farmers in a field. As a tribute to the future of agriculture, the third panel shows a farmer driving a tractor, with a man and woman behind a fence.

The sculpture was done by Florida artist Lewis Watkins, founder of the American Ideals Foundation, a non-profit organization based in Brooksville, Fla., that planned and financed the memorial.

The earthen dome is 39-foot, 10-inches in radius and 17-foot, 9-inches tall at its center. The U.S. flag, flags of each of the 50 states, the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the Agricultural Hall of Fame surround the dome. Flag bearers for the ceremony were about 60 representatives of Future Farmers of America chapters from throughout the state.

Another Florida resident contributing to the weekend was conductor/composer Robert Moffa. Moffa conducted the American Ideals Foundation Symphonic Orchestra in a world premiere concert of an original composition, "American Farmers' Orchestral Suite," at a concert Sunday night at the Midland Center for the Performing Arts in Kansas City, Mo.

In other remarks during the dedication, Gov. John Carlin said the facility is "a site for all of us concerned and interested in agriculture."

He said while the ceremony was to honor "those in agriculture past, present and future...let's also dedicate ourselves to working together to make the future what we want it to be."

He said that future would include "a farmer we can be proud of — and a farmer making a profit."

Other dignitaries at the Labor Day dedication included U.S. Rep. Jan Meyers, R-Overland Park; Peter Myers, deputy secretary of agriculture; and Donald Senterfitt, president of the American Bank Association.

Caesareans increase with fetal monitor

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — The common habit of continuously monitoring fetal heartbeat during childbirth leads to slightly more Caesarean deliveries but doesn't produce healthier babies, a new study concludes.

Although continuous electronic monitoring is considered prudent during high-risk pregnancies, the researchers found that it carries no advantage for routine deliveries, even though most doctors use it for all births.

"There are no infant benefits that we could detect in low-risk deliveries," said Dr. Kenneth J. Leveno of the University of Texas Southwestern Medical School. "The prudent person would interpret that to mean that low-risk women should not be monitored routinely."

The study was published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, along with a second paper suggesting that private doctors perform more Caesarean sections than do residents on hospital staffs.

In both cases, researchers suggested that fear of malpractice suits is one factor prompting physicians to monitor fetal hearts and deliver infants by Caesarean section.

Leveno's study suggests that when doctors use the monitor to look for trouble, strapped to the mother's abdomen, they will find it even when none exists.

The problem, he says, is that fetal monitors "do not precisely identify the baby in distress all the time. Most children with abnormal fetal heart rates are really in good condition."

However, Dr. Henry Klapholz of Boston's Beth Israel Hospital, said routine monitoring may still be worthwhile.

"It's my belief that periodically there are patients who benefit," he said. "There are not many and there is a cost. If one is interested in getting the maximum possible protection for their baby, then one should use this."

In a separate report, Dr. Roberta Haynes de Reght of City Hospital Center at Elmhurst, N.Y., studied the Caesarean rate at four New York City hospitals. Patients of private-practice doctors were significantly more likely to have Caesarean deliveries than were those attended by resident physicians on hospital staffs.

"Although some have suggested that convenience and financial considerations are responsible for the higher Caesarean birth rates among private patients," she wrote, "a more probable consideration is physicians' concern about professional liability if there is an adverse outcome."

Staff residents may be less worried about being sued if they avoid Caesareans and deliver a defective child, since their legal costs and malpractice insurance are covered by their hospitals.

Law to net $120 million annually

Tax reform bill to assist state funding

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas stands to gain in the neighborhood of $120 million annually as a result of the federal tax overhaul bill now awaiting final congressional approval, Secretary of Revenue Harley T. Duncan told the Legislative Budget Committee Wednesday.

"Our preliminary work indicates that is not an unreasonable number for the annualized impact of the phased-in bill," Duncan said.

However, Duncan warned lawmakers to be cautious about making decisions on what to do with the projected $120 million windfall because Kansas probably won't see that much extra money in the state treasury until sometime in 1988.

During the current fiscal year the state should receive a "very modest" benefit from the tax reform bill and a somewhat greater impact is expected during the fiscal year that begins July 1, 1987, Duncan said.

Because many details of the federal tax plan aren't yet known, Duncan said he could not provide figures on how much the state might receive during the two years. He said he would have better estimates within about six weeks.

But Duncan said the federal legislation still presents a lot of issues for the 1987 Kansas Legislature to consider when it convenes in January.

Chief among the questions facing state lawmakers is the threshold where low income people must start paying state taxes, according to the revenue secretary. Duncan said a family of four now must pay state taxes when income exceeds $6,800, but by 1988, the same family won't have to pay federal taxes until earnings exceed about $13,000.

Other questions the Legislature may face in January include whether Kansas should make its income tax forms match the federal forms more closely and, if not, lawmakers must consider whether the differences between the state and federal tax forms will make filling out returns too complicated for most taxpayers, Duncan said.

Of course, the biggest question will be what to do with the additional money the state stands to reap as a result of the federal changes, Duncan said.

"You have three choices: You can spend it, you can save it or you can give it back to the taxpayers in one way or another," Duncan told the committee.

The state stands to gain money because the state tax forms use federal adjusted gross income as the Kansas adjusted gross income, he said.

The federal changes will generally increase taxpayers' adjusted gross incomes but compensate for that on federal returns with lower tax rates, Duncan said. However, the state's tax rates will remain the same, he said.

During the hearing, Duncan disclosed that his department likely will grant a corporate income tax refund of between $10 million and $12 million late this year on a return filed by "a group of closely related corporations" that had been filing returns separately but filed for 1985 as "a unitary business."

The refund amounts to virtually all the state income taxes the group of corporations paid last year, he said.

Robert C. Harder, secretary of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, added a gloomy note earlier in the day when he reported his agency may need an extra $10 million in general tax money when the Legislature convenes in January.

Harder told the committee a review of expenditures during the first two months of the current fiscal year showed the state's medical assistance program may need a $6.3 million shot in the arm from the State General Fund before the budget year concludes June 30, 1987.

In addition, the agency is projecting a $2.5 million shortfall in general tax dollars for the Aid to Dependent Children program, Harder said. The department also needs to shore up the balance in an account it uses to deposit various agency fees, he said.

Instead of having a $2 million balance in the fees account when the current fiscal year began July 1, Harder said there was a $1.1 million balance — a difference of $900,000 which the department may ask the Legislature to make up next spring.

388 pledge sororities during summer rush

By The Collegian Staff

During summer rush, 388 women decided to "go greek" by pledging one of 12 sororities on campus.

The number of women going through rush increased by 12 percent, said Barb Robel, adviser to Greek Affairs. Last year 377 women participated in summer rush. That number increased to 419 women this summer, she said.

Robel said the number of women actually pledging a house was at a record high. Ninety-two percent of the women who went through summer rush pledged one of the houses.

Robel said there is an increased interest in greek life throughout the country.

Increased participation may also be due to the recent changes made in the rush publication mailed to freshmen and transfer students, Robel said.

Robel said that a lowered grade point requirement also caused the rush participation numbers to increase. The grade point requirement was lowered from a 2.7 to a 2.5 for freshmen and from a 2.5 to 2.3 for upperclass women.

The sororities which pledged the most women were Chi Omega, Gamma Phi Beta and Pi Beta Phi with 39 pledges. The average pledge class size for the other sororities was 35, Robel said.

The newest sorority on campus, Alpha Gamma Delta, pledged 10 women. Robel said this was an average number of pledges for a sorority without a house.

Housing for Alpha Gamma Delta is scheduled to be built in the fall of 1987, but Robel said it will be two years before they have housing.

"It took Sigma Sigma Sigma five years to get off the ground. I feel once they (Alpha Gamma Delta) have competitive housing plans, they will become more competitive," she said.

Bus

dropped and some of the cities affected:

—Kansas City, Mo., to Tulsa, Okla., via Joplin, Mo. The bus serves Overland Park, Olathe, Louisburg, Pleasanton, Fort Scott, Arma and Pittsburg along U.S. 69.

—Kansas City, Mo., to Denver. The bus serves through Kansas City, Lawrence, Topeka, Manhattan, Junction City, Abilene, Salina, Russell, Hays, Wakeeney, Oakley, Colby and Goodland. However, Kansas City, Lawrence and Topeka would not lose service because Trailways plans to maintain a route through those cities.

—Kansas City, Mo., to Denver. In addition to several cities in the previous route, this bus serves Rossville, St. Marys, Wamego, Glasco, Beloit, Cawker, City, Downs, Osborne, Alton, Stockton, Phillipsburg, Norton, Oberlin, Atwood and St. Francis on a more circuitous path to Denver.

—Wichita to Pueblo, Colo. The bus serves Wichita, Cheney, Kingman, Cunningham, Pratt, Haviland, Greensburg, Bucklin, Dodge City, Cimarron, Garden City, Lakin and Syracuse.

—Wichita to Joplin, Mo. The bus serves Cedar Vale, Sedan, Peru, Nitaze, Caney, Tyro, Coffeyville, Edna, Chetopa, Baxter Springs and Galena.

The latest request comes in addition to a petition filed July 11 in which Trailways sought permission to drop two Wichita to Lincoln, Neb., routes which provide service to 10 Kansas cities citing a lack of patronage.

The two routes serve McPherson, Hesston, Moundridge, Lindsborg, Belleville, Concordia, Marysville, Waterville, Blue Rapids and Minneapolis and they would be left without any bus service.

By cutting back its Kansas operations, Trailways would save more than 1,500 miles of driving.

"We're trying to get rid of the worst routes to save the best," Myers said. "We hope to make it on the Kansas City to Oklahoma City route."

Myers said several economic factors have force the cost-cutting action by Trailways, which has been in business since 1933. Simply put, fewer and fewer people are riding buses and Myers pointed to statistics as evidence. According to his figures, Trailways buses carried 14 million passengers in 1984 and just 12.2 million in 1985.

"A lot of things have been building but we've really been hurt recently by cheap gasoline and cheap airfares," he said. "People are driving themselves more and flying."

There are no other bus companies offering as comprehensive service in Kansas. Greyhound Bus Lines operates a Kansas City to Denver route parallel to the Trailways' Interstate 70 run. However, it does not offer any other significant routes in the state.

K.G. Lines Inc. has a route which basically follows U.S. 169 in southeast Kansas from Coffeyville to Garnett and picks up U.S. 59 into Lawrence before turning east into Kansas City.

Other smaller bus companies have routes from Liberal to Garden City in southwest Kansas and from Dodge City to Norton.

Docking reveals plan to rid Kansas of crime

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Lt. Gov. Tom Docking today unveiled his plan for ridding Kansas streets of crime in which he advocated tougher sentencing and more limited parole for violent criminals and urged counties to combine their resources to hire "well-paid professionals" to ensure effective prosecution of criminals.

Docking, the Democratic nominee for governor, also said an expanded Kansas Highway Patrol and creation of "neighborhood police centers" are key components of his "comprehensive package of protecting victims, enforcing the law and keeping violent offenders off the streets."

"My opponent proposes the death penalty as the single solution to the overall crime problem," Docking told a Statehouse news conference. "I disagree. His proposal is one-tenth of one percent of the solution — that is the percentage of serious crimes in Kansas for which the death penalty might apply.

Docking said the Republican nominee for governor, House Speaker Mike Hayden, has tried to oversimplify the crime problem in the minds of voters and is misleading them by portraying capital punishment as a cure-all for Kansas crime. Docking said the death penalty is more of a placebo which will have little impact on the problem.

He also ripped Hayden for suggesting that it might be appropriate to test all 35,000 state employees and faculty at state universities for drugs. Docking said drug tests should only be a part of the solution to combating drug use in society.

"Drug testing is a tool, it's not a policy," Docking said. "Alone, it can't get the job done. Wholesale, mass drug testing is irresponsible and ineffective and not a way to deal with the problem. It's a tool that should be carefully used on people in an identifiable risk category.

"Mandatory drug testing of thousands of state employees is a bad idea that would be extraordinarily expensive and wouldn't get the job done."

Docking said testing of college athletes at the state's six universities is a good idea because the "need is apparent." However, he said testing of law enforcement officers, surgeons or others in key positions related to public health and welfare should not be tested unless a problem develops.

A complete overhaul of the state's system of justice is needed, Docking said, starting with changes in legislative policy which "has left our criminal code in a muddled mess."

"My first priority as governor will be to reform our system of sentencing. Those convicted of heinous crimes, like first-degree murder, must never again walk the streets of our communities and neighborhoods.

"I will ensure that all violent criminals serve longer sentences and I will reduce the amount of time off awarded for 'good behavior,' a practice which serves to make our sentences short and meaningless."

week as saying his warships intercept 15 to 20 commercial vessels a day to make sure they do not carry cargo that would benefit Iraq's war effort.

Most detained ships are allowed to resume their trips after searches. Others have been taken to Bandar Abbas, where their cargoes were unloaded and confiscated.

The American freighter President Taylor was stopped and boarded outside the Strait of Hormuz last January on a voyage to the United Arab Emirates port of Fujairah. In May, U.S. warships in the Indian Ocean prevented the interception of another American cargo ship, the President McKinley.

U.S., British and French naval vessels patrol the Persian Gulf, the narrow Strait of Hormuz that leads from the gulf to the Indian Ocean and the strait's environs in the Gulf of Oman.

Soviet warships also cover the area outside the Hormuz.

Shipping executives said an average of two Soviet or East European freighters a day ply the gulf waters. They expressed surprise that Iran would harass Soviet ships while the Kremlin is trying to improve relations with Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's fundamentalist Shiite Moslem government.

Executives gave this description of the Pyotr Yemtsov seizure, based on radio contacts they and their monitors had with other ships in the gulf:

An Iranian warship ordered the captain to stop when the freighter was about 30 miles northwest of Dubai. It signaled a threat to open fire, and the Soviet skipper turned his vessel and tried to escape.

The Iranian ship caught up after a brief chase and again threatened to shoot. The Pyotr Yemtsov's captain cut back his engines and Iranian commandos boarded, either by boat or helicopter.

An aide to Dole, Mark Scanlon, said Wednesday last week's increase in the subsidy did not surprise him because many felt the $13 figure was too low.

Lugar said the issue dominated his discussions with Prime Minister Robert Hawke and other officials during a vsit to Australia last week. Australia contends the American subsidy will deprive Australian growers of markets, and set off a subsidy war.

QUESTION #1.

WHAT IS THE RIGHT CHOICE FOR MOST COLLEGE STUDENTS?

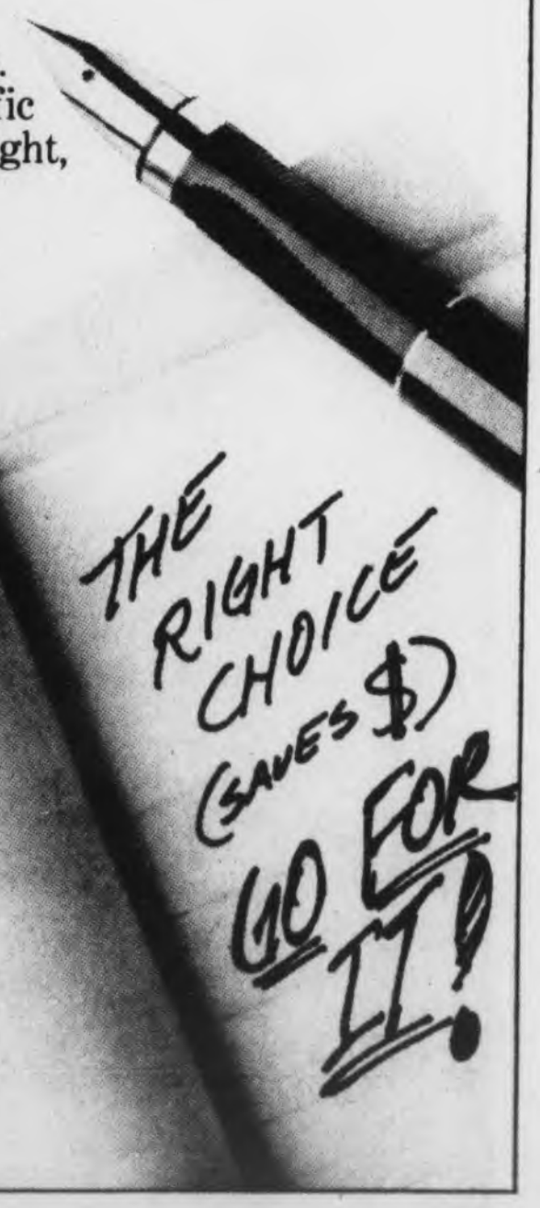
a) AT&T—for everyday discounts of 40% to over 50% off weekday rates on out-of-state calls.

b) Short bursts of intense study followed by hours of frantic partying.

c) AT&T—for exceptional value and high quality service.

d) AT&T—for collect, third-party and operator-assisted long distance calls.

e) Any class that does not conflict with "The Love Connection."



If you picked A, C and D, you're destined for great things. Like AT&T Long Distance Service. AT&T offers so many terrific values. Like a 40% to over 50% discount off our day rate on night, evening, and weekend out-of-state calls.

Imagine what you'll do with the money you could save. Imagine what your parents would do if they found out.

Of course, you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections any place you call. And AT&T gives you immediate credit for wrong numbers.

To find out more about why you should choose AT&T, give us a call. And if you picked B and E, call anyway. You could probably use someone to talk to.

Gunmen seize Pan Am 747

By The Associated Press

KARACHI, Pakistan — Four men dressed as security guards and firing machine guns seized a Pan Am jumbo jet filled with nearly 400 people at Karachi airport early today, and at least four people were wounded, officials in Pakistan said.

Pan Am spokeswoman Pamela Hanlon in New York said a young Asian man was shot on the plane sometime after it was seized and was taken from the Boeing 747 in unknown condition. She said she could not confirm if the man was a passenger or who had shot him.

Pan Am's manager at Karachi, Viraf Daroga, was on the tarmac negotiating with the gunmen through a megaphone as heavily armed Pakistani soldiers and commandos surrounded the plane and cordoned off the area.

A Pakistani air force spokesman, who refused to be identified, said the gunmen appeared to be Arabs, and that "they are speaking English."

The gunmen were demanding to be flown to Cyprus.

The three-man cockpit crew managed to escape through an emergency hatch. The plane had just arrived from Bombay, India, en route to New York. The Pan Am office in Bombay said about 41 Americans were among the passengers.

The attackers fired machine-gun bursts into the air when seizing the plane. Two airport ground crew members were injured in the assault, but it was not clear if they were shot.

Hours after the plane was seized, the gunmen opened fire from the plane at airport personnel and wounded at least one worker of Pakistan's Civil Aviation Administration, officials said.

Airportpolice also said they believed one person was wounded on the plane.

Pakistani army generals and top civilian officials were directing the security operation from the airport

Harriet Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, has been compiling a dictionary of the Shinzwani language for the past nine years. Shinzwani is one of two principal languages spoken in the Comoro Islands, a set of islands located off the east coast of Africa.

Professor finishes foreign dictionary

By ELIZABETH EDWARDS
Contributing Writer

Imagine creating a whole dictionary.

Now, imagine compiling a dictionary of a foreign language for a country on the other side of the world.

Harriet Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, has been compiling a Shinzwani dictionary for the last nine years. Shinzwani and Kingazija are the principal languages spoken in the Comoro Islands, located off the east coast of Africa. Both languages are members of the Bantu language family, Ottenheimer said.

The dictionary is now basically ready for publication, and Ottenheimer is in communication with three publishers who "appear to be seriously interested," she said.

"What I initially started out to do is done, although a dictionary is never really done. You can always add more. Especially in this case, because I have only compiled 6,000 entries and the language is much larger than that."

Ottenheimer credits much of her accomplishment to computers, which she began using four years ago. She said that prior to that time, the dictionary compilation, hand-done by students, was funded with small grants from the Graduate School's Bureau of General Research.

In 1982, she also began corresponding with Robert Hsu, a professor of linguistics at the University of Hawaii. Hsu later wrote computer programs specifically for handling Shinzwani words in the dictionary process and to prepare the basic data files for computer typesetting, she said.

Last year Ottenheimer received a $45,000 grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities to complete the dictionary. As a result, she was able to update her computer equipment, which sped up the compilation process.

The basic data in the text was prepared on her office microcomputer, while most of the sorting and printing was done on the academic computer in Cardwell Hall, she said.

"I'm constantly amazed at the fact that something like this — a project of this magnitude and of this complexity — could not have been done in such a short amount of time without computers and computer programs," Ottenheimer said.

"It's mind-boggling to think I could take a handwritten list of 6,000 words and get them to the

Wefald to request recruitment money

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

The $70,000 to $80,000 the KSU Foundation allocates each year for recruitment projects is "not enough" and President Jon Wefald said he plans to ask for more.

No figure has been set as to how much will be requested, Wefald said.

"When enrollment goes down, you lose money. And K-State has lost money in the last two years," he said.

The Kansas Legislature approves funding for higher education systems based the amount of funding on the number of students enrolled, Wefald said.

For this reason, he said, stabilizing the University's enrollment is a "very high priority."

Last year the KSU Foundation allocated about $75,500 to various colleges and departments to assist the University in student recruitment, said Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement.

The money was spent on recruitment projects such as career days, out-of-state recruitment travel, open houses, radio and television advertisements and publications, he said.

Although the projects have been "good, high quality activities," they've been done "on a shoestring budget," Bosco said.

"Student recruitment activities have been a low priority here at K-State," he said. "We most definitely need more money to support scholarships and start recruitment activities."

NASA to use Konza Prairie, satellite for climate research

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

A high tech research project will connect K-State and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration throughout 1987 with the establishment of the International Satellite Land Surface Climatology Project at the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area, south of Manhattan.

Approximately 100 scientists from NASA and universities throughout the nation and Europe will be conducting land experiments on the Konza Prairie, said Ghasem Asrar, assistant professor of agronomy.

"Earth-observing satellites will be used in conjuction with the land experiments to obtain information about land surface conditions," Asrar said.

The experiments will measure incoming solar radiation from the sun and wind speed, temperature, humidity and radiation reflected from the surface, he said.

Information acquired from the experiments will be used to increase understanding of weather's impact on land surface conditions. Scientists also will use the information to assess changes in the weather over short and long periods of time, Asrar said.

The project budget is approximately $3 million for the first year during which field experiments will take place Asrar said. Analyzing of the data will be done in 1988 and 1989.

The primary funding will come from NASA. However, the National Science Foundation will consider funding proposals from individual scientists who would like to conduct experiments in the same area of interest to the project, he said.

"Several scientists from K-State have submitted proposals to NASA to participate in this project," Asrar said.

All of the proposals sent to NASA from scientists throughout the nation and Europe will be reviewed, and qualified scientists will be selected to participate, he said.

"NASA's primary benefit from this project will be obtaining technical information about the potential of the earth-observing satellites and their future roles," he said. In the future these earth-observing satellites will be used to monitor the earth surface conditions and predict the weather.

NASA officials and a group of scientists from K-State and other universities spent nearly two years evaluating potential sites in the United States for the project.

Asrar said the prairie was selected because of its uniformity in vegetation type, large size, proximity to K-State and the fact that the prairie has not been disturbed for decades.

Size of the project site was important, Asrar said, adding that the Konza Prairie is the largest tallgrass area in North America. Because of its size, the prairie can be detected by most earth-observing satellites.

Edward Kanemasu, professor of agronomy and director of K-State's evapotranspiration lab, will represent K-State and coordinate local activities.

Asrar and Kanemasu were members of the science working group that prepared the documents for the project in 1984. Asrar also has been asked by NASA to help coordinate the project between K-State, NASA and the other scientists.

Probe reveals soybeans purposely soiled

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said Thursday an inquest by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation produced "shocking evidence" that soybeans produced in Kansas were intentionally soiled with 300 tons of dirt before being sold and shipped overseas from a Kansas grain elevator.

Stephan made the claim in a letter to members of the Kansas congressional delegation in which he urged the federal lawmakers to "do all within your power to convince your colleagues to take action" on bills designed to protect the quality of American grain shipped in international markets.

In addition, the Republican attorney general said he will seek action from the Kansas Legislature to make it illegal to intentionally dump dirt and other foreign material into Kansas grain. He said such laws would make exceptions for accepted practices of mixing grain.

"Through my office and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, we have been involved in an investigation...into soybeans being sold by the Atchison County Farmers Union Cooperative Association," Stephan said in the letter. "This intentional addition of dirt to Kansas soybeans took place during 1984.

"Specifically, our investigation disclosed that over 300 tons of soil was hauled to the Atchison County Cooperative; truckload after truckload, and mixed with soybeans which were being shipped by barge.

"This apparently was done with the knowledge of the Gulf-port purchaser, Zen-Noh Grain Corp., which had contracted with the Kansas grain elevator for soybeans containing as much as 20 percent foreign matter. It is our understanding the dirty soybeans were to be sold abroad."

At stake in this issue, he said, is the integrity of Kansas grain and its reputation in the world market.

Stephan said he was "quite surprised" to find neither state nor federal law appears to clearly prohibit such adulteration of grain.

"Kansas farmers and grain dealers have a right to be outraged by this incident," Stephan said. "I believe this is a rare exception to the normal treatment Kansas grain dealers give to grain entrusted to their custody. However rare this incident is, it does provide us with a shocking example of the problem of dirty grain shipped form U.S. ports."

Another example of the problems was visible to Stephan when he visited Amman, Jordan, eariler this year and a U.S. Embassy agricultural expert told him recent shipments of American grain were infested with insects.

State high school debaters to analyze U.S. ag policy

By The Collegian Staff

More than 1,000 high school debaters will be on campus this weekend to participate in the K-State Fall Debate Workshop.

David Mugler, associate dean for the College of Agriculture, said the students will represent about 70 high schools.

Mugler said he first became interested in debate because of his children's participation in the activity at Manhattan High School, and after hearing this year's topic, contacts were made to produce the workshop.

The topic for this year is "Resolved: that the federal government should implement a comprehensive, long-term agricultural policy in the United States."

Also working with Mugler to set up the workshop are Ed Schiappa, K-State debate coach, and Roger Brannan, debate coach at Manhattan High School.

Several different sessions will address agricultural topics and the techniques of debate. University faculty, administration and K-State debate team members will be helping at the workshop.

President Jon Wefald is scheduled to welcome participants, before activities begin at 9 a.m. Saturday.

Gov. John Carlin and Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, are scheduled to speak at the 12:30 p.m. luncheon in the Union's Main Ballroom. The closing session is to begin at 4 p.m.

The workshop, which is free of charge to registered participants, is the first of its type to be hosted at the University. Mugler said funding for the workshop is coming from the University and donations from a variety of Kansas agribusinesses.

He also said the workshop should provide a good opportunity to recruit students to K-State.

Bomb kills 3 French soldiers

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A roadside bomb killed three French soldiers serving with the U.N. peacekeeping force and wounded a fourth as they jogged in south Lebanon Thursday, a U.N. spokesman said.

The French government condemned the attack and said it confirmed the need to reassess the mission of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon.

It was the ninth serious attack on the nine-nation peacekeeping force since the current round of attacks started Aug. 11.

No one claimed responsibility for Thursday's bomb. However, local security sources in south Lebanon, speaking on condition of anonymity, have blamed most of the recent attacks on pro-Iranian Shiite Moslem factions.

A Foreign Ministry statement in Paris urged the United Nations and Lebanon to take steps "to permit UNIFIL to carry out its mission under the indispensable conditions of effectiveness and security."

Nuclear power plant sets mark

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Wolf Creek nuclear power plant near Burlington, completed its first year of operation Wednesday, setting a record for first-year commercial power production by a U.S. nuclear plant.

The Atomic Industrial Forum in Bethesda, Md., said Thursday that Wolf Creek completed its first year of commercial service 1:14 a.m. Wednesday. The plant produced 8.922 billion kilowatt-hours of electric energy during the year.

The previous record for first-year power production by a U.S. nuclear facility was set in May by Diablo Canyon 1 in San Luis Obispo, Calif. The plant, owned by Pacific Gas and Electric Co., produced 8.699 billion kilowatt-hours of electricity during its initial year. The Diablo plant broke a record of 8.475 billion kilowatt-hours set by the Callaway plant near Fulton, Mo.

Man saves girl at laundromat

GARDEN GROVE, Calif. — A 4-year-old girl was trapped for several minutes inside a running washing machine at a laundromat before a man broke the glass door and saved her, police said Thursday.

The child was playing with her 8-year-old cousin and 7-year-old sister in the laundromat late Wednesday when she crawled inside the machine, Lt. Jack Stepanovich said.

A customer had already placed coins in the machine but had taken out the clothing because he believed the machine wasn't working, Stepanovich said.

"The 4-year-old climbed inside the washing machine, and her sister shut the door," Lt. Larry Hodges said. "The machine started filling up with water. An aunt was called, but she could not open the door because of the automatic lock. A citizen, Scott Norman, heard the screaming and ran to the laundromat. He hit the glass door...breaking the glass and saving the 4-year-old."

The child was taken to St. Mary's Hospital in Long Beach, where her condition was listed as good.

Norman, 35, said he was on his way home from a job installing a floor at a condominium when a man ran up to him and asked if he had tools to free the child.

FHA promises to help farmers

WASHINGTON — Farmers who get tough letters from a debt-collection company were promised a fair deal Thursday by the head of the Farmers Home Administration, the Agriculture Department agency that hired the firm.

Vance Clark, administrator of the FmHA, said the agency has a responsibility to collect $630 million owed by 6,500 delinquent borrowers who received collection notices from Capital Credit Corp., based in Fairfield, N.J.

"There is, sadly, the perception that we are moving in an unsympathetic, bureaucratic fashion against those who have suffered the most as a result of economic problems in American agriculture and who are least able to make payments," Clark said in a statement.

"We are deeply aware of the great difficulties many farmers are facing and are striving to help them weather the financial storm," he said.

"At the same time, we are responsible for balancing the interests of all farmers, including those who are not in serious jeopardy, and the interest of all taxpayers, against the concerns of those individuals from whom we are attempting to collect these long-overdue debts."

Clark said the New Jersey firm was hired as part of a government-wide effort to reduce the volume of seriously delinquent debt. He said the debts involved "collection only" accounts, which he described as one in which the borrower's security has been disposed of.

'Star Wars' to run test today

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — A "Star Wars" satellite scheduled for a secret launch today will track a second payload and may try to destroy it, sources said.

Neither the Strategic Defense Initiative Office nor the National Aeronautics and Space Administration will acknowledge the launch of the Delta booster rocket.

The two agencies said only that they will inform reporters a few hours before launch and escort them to a viewing site at Cape Canaveral. At the site, the reporters will be given four minutes advance notice of the launching.

SDIO, which manages President Reagan's space-based missile defense project popularly known as Star Wars, said it would disclose the payloads and details of the operation after the launching.

Sources, who spoke on condition they not be identified, said two payloads would be involved. The objectives, they said, are to obtain spectral data with infrared sensors and to test guidance and navigation systems.

One element of the defense system envisions scores of space-based satellites equipped with lasers and other devices to knock out hostile rockets and warheads.

"They're going to do some kind of acquisition and tracking; in other words, can you pick up the target and stay on it?" said John Pike, associate director of space policy for the American Federation of Scientists.

Retailers post August gains

The nation's major retailers, reporting that back-to-school items sold well during the latter part of August, today posted solid sales gains for the month.

Sears, Roebuck and Co., the largest retailer, said its sales for the four weeks ended Aug. 30 rose 4.3 percent over a year ago.

No. 2 K mart Corp. said its sales increased 7.4 percent.

J.C. Penney Co., ranked third, posted a 5.5 percent gain.

Sales spurted 40 percent at fast-growing Wal-Mart Stores Inc., No. 5, and 9 percent at No. 7 F.W. Woolworth Co.

Correction

A story in the Aug. 29 Collegian inaccurately reported that 162 abortions were performed in Riley County in 1984.

According to Riley County Health Department information, no physician in the county performs abortions. In 1984, 162 women between ages 15 and 24 who listed Riley County as their residence received abortions elsewhere in the state.

These statistics were collected by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

S. African police disrupt mass funeral

Funeral ban provokes youth violence

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Security forces filled a stadium with tear gas to stop a mass funeral for riot victims Thursday, then swept through Soweto breaking up other services and battling gangs of youths, witnesses said.

A Soweto clergyman said, "The fact that people managed to get through the dragnet to bury their dead is laudable." He asked not to be identified.

Young men with whips roved the streets, lashing people who tried to go to their jobs in Johannesburg.

The funeral organized by anti-apartheid leaders in defiance of police orders was to have been held for 20 people killed by police gunfire during riots Aug. 26-27 in the huge black township outside Johannesburg.

Fifteen of the victims were buried at a nearby cemetery after police drove mourners from Javavu soccer stadium near White City, the Soweto neighborhood hit hardest by the violence, clergymen and Soweto residents said.

Clergymen said they formed a human barrier in the stadium at one point to avert what appeared to be an imminent confrontation between police and mourners.

According to the government's Bureau for Information, which provides official accounts of unrest under the nationwide state of emergency imposed June 12, "several smaller funerals did take place." It gave no details.

Youths angered by the ban on the mass funeral set up street barricades in neighborhoods throughout Soweto, which is home to about two million people. The government reported fire-bombings, stone-throwing and attacks by militants on residents who disregarded a call to stay away from work.

Security men sped through the township in armored vehicles, firing tear gas canisters and sometimes birdshot.

There were unconfirmed reports of casualties, but the Bureau for Information said police had filed no reports of deaths or injuries.

Witnesses said a woman was killed when she fell in front of a train while fleeing from young men who used whips to prevent people from going to jobs in Johannesburg. A man was hurt when he jumped from the train to escape the whips, they said.

Tens of thousands of Sowetans skipped work in hopes of attending the funeral, to protest police actions or in fear of the whip gangs.

A man who took 20 people into his home for protection from tear gas said, "We'll stay away until we bury our dead."

Witnesses gave this account of the scene in Soweto:

Most shops were closed. Commuters going to work in the morning and returning in the evening were lashed with whips and pelted with stones.

Students call off race

By The Collegian Staff

For the second year in a row, the annual KU-KSU Canoe Race has been canceled. The race had taken place for 16 consecutive years prior to last year.

Kerri Weddle, senior in political science and president of the Association of Residence Halls, said somehow there was "a mix-up in the communications."

Last spring, representatives from both K-State and the University of Kansas met to discuss future plans for the race, tentatively set for the weekend of Sept. 20 and 21. Because KU's representatives did not have their 1986 football schedule with them, they agreed to notify K-State if that date would not be available.

"We were never notified," Weddle said.

It was during registration that Weddle found out KU had changed the race to Sept. 6 and 7. Weddle said the committee tried to get in touch with landholders along the river to gain access to the various race checkpoints. However, at that late date the committee was not able to reach all the landowners.

Nevertheless, teams from K-State's residence halls will continue with the race, along with any alumni teams that wish to participate non-competitively. The event will take place Sept. 20 on the Kansas River from Manhattan to St. Marys.

The event was not conducted last year due to a long string of K-State home football games.

Sponsors are concerned the tradition might be lost because this is the second year the race will not take place. Their goal is to get things organized early for next year in hopes the tradition can continue, Weddle said.

New director to raise awareness of board

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate approved Kelli Carr, senior in journalism and mass communications, as the new Consumer Relations Board director at its meeting Thursday night.

Carr said she will try to make students more aware of the services Consumer Relations offers by developing a class through University For Man, providing information flyers to living groups and advertising in the campus directory.

"Most of our services concern landlord/tenant problems," she said.

The board also works with an attorney on legal issues and refers students to court or counsel, she said.

In other business, senate approved Debbie Fields, senior in finance, as Student Governing Association work-study secretary.

Concern was expressed by senate members about the cost and necessity of proposed purple carpeting for the Union Stateroom.

Other issues being investigated by senate members include unsafe storage of chemicals on campus and a possible change in parking policy. The policy change being looked into would allow car owners without permits to park on campus after 6:30 p.m. Currently, parking permits are required until 7:30 p.m.

Senate meets at 7 p.m. each Thursday in the Union Big Eight room. All senate meetings are open to the public.

Raids won't dampen Bolivian drug export

For several weeks now, the U.S. military has been engaged in a hot war against drugs in the South American country of Bolivia.

They have been using Blackhawk helicopters to fly Bolivian troops into the jungle to raid secret cocaine processing plants. This recent escalation of President Reagan's war against drugs has reportedly cut Bolivia's cocaine production by 90 percent.

Other troubles face this very poor country. The government there has announced it is closing down the country's tin mines because of the metal's falling price. This is a disastrous situation for the people of Bolivia because tin is one of the biggest industries in the country. With its demise comes the demise of many people in a country already wracked by severe economic problems.

The paradox of the situation is that the Bolivian people depend on cocaine to live. It is believed that more than half the population makes its living from cocaine. These people are not getting rich from drugs; they are carving out a meager existence from the poverty that surrounds them. With the military shutting down cocaine production and tin mines closing, the people are left to starve.

While the cocaine industry may have suffered a serious blow, it will bounce back very soon. Starving people will go to great lengths to feed their families. They don't care about drugs, only survival. If President Reagan thinks that a few helicopters are going to solve the problem, he better think again.

Cocaine production will flourish as long as the poor economic conditions in Latin America continue to persist. They need economic help, not helicopters. Without it, they haven't got a chance.

Drinking could spoil afternoon of boating

It's a beautiful Saturday afternoon and you're relaxing by the water at Tuttle Creek Reservoir. Then a motorboat charges through the water, slicing a deep path through the lake's surface and leaving a trail of beer cans in its wake.

Drunken drivers on the water have become a new type of menacing motorist. The public has addressed drunken driving on our nation's roads, but what are we doing to correct the problem of drunken driving on the waterways? This activity is just as dangerous, if not more so, than drunken driving on land.

When a motorist is involved in an accident on land, the victim will normally come to rest on the land. However, in a boating accident, the victim is even more at risk by landing in the water; an unconscious victim in the water will drown.

The boaters themselves are not the only ones at risk. If they are operating a boat while intoxicated, they understand the danger in which they put themselves. However, the innocent skier or swimmer will often suffer at the hands of these drivers. Many of our waterways are used for recreational purposes; these drunken drivers are putting innocent people in danger.

It is against the law to operate a boat while intoxicated. It is not against the law to be drinking on a boat. We should try to make our waterways as safe as our streets.

The National Coast Guard is distributing information about proposed legislation restricting alcohol on public waterways. It is time for this type of legislation.

Driving drunk has been a well-publicized danger for some time, but drunken driving on the water is not something many people consider. Boaters must realize the irresponsibility of drinking on the water and wait until they're on shore to pop open that can of beer.

Cartoon in bad taste

Editor,

Re: The editorial cartoon in Wednesday's Collegian.

...with liberty and justice for whom?

While thinking of the correct response to the illustration on the editorial page in the Wednesday issue of the Collegian, I was at a loss for words. In my search, despite all the outrage that overwhelmed me, I found an adequate response.

Realizing that K-State is an institution of higher education, I believe that a few intelligent people could overlook the derogatory statement made by the drawing. The drawing depicts a sterotypical view of black features that went out, I thought, with slavery. The facial features are the caricature of an ape.

In my experience with illustrations, there are certain exaggerated features, but the drawing did nothing more than reinforce prejudices I thought buried. Some students could be misled to believe that this caricature is an acceptable comic image of blacks.

Attending K-State has always been a pleasure for me, but this cartoon could destroy the spirit the campus and community have worked so hard for. How can we justify walking around with open minds when the campus paper pollutes minds with what I consider a negative attack on blacks because it offends black people and all caring people.

I will close by adding to my response a few paragraphs taken from a guest editorial in the Journal of Negro Education. The title of the editorial is "Just What is 'Racial Pride?'"

"Racial pride is setting the best example in our educational, social, employment and leisure activities. Racial pride is founded upon a philosophy that sets the construction, evolution and progress of our society and culture as its primary aim and works through individuals to achieve its aim.

Students with racial pride look toward the usefulness of their training, they obtain basic critical thinking skills sufficient to establish their own values and to make critical choices among values in a society.

Teachers/educators with racial pride reach beyond themselves and beyond expectations of states and institutions. They demand more of themselves and of those whom they would educate — because they know that more is required of them in the society in which they live."

What is racial pride? Taking the positive with the negative but recognizing the negative.

Blacks will continue freedom fight

KEHLA MDLULI
Guest Columnist

Once again the illegal regime of apartheid has demonstrated itself as the main cause of tension and instability within South Africa. Last week the so-called security forces of the regime went on a killing rampage in the township of White City in Soweto, killing more than 25 innocent people protesting eviction.

The killing of unarmed people by soldiers and police has become an order of the day for black South Africans. This killing spree by the Botha forces on civilians is a calculated move to intimidate and silence the struggling masses of South Africa. The regime is in crisis and its response is bound to be deadly not only to black South Africans, but also to all opponents of apartheid living in southern Africa.

On May 19 the forces of South Africa raided Botswana, Zimbabwe and Zambia killing innocent citizens and destroying property. Since the inception of the June 16 uprisings in South Africa, countries neighboring the regime have been subjected to continual harassment as a result of their opposition to the cruel system existing in South Africa. Their harboring of freedom-loving individuals fleeing apartheid provided a pretext for the regime to attack them.

In 1982, the newly independent country of Mozambique was forced to sign an unprincipled peace agreement, the Inkomaati Accord, with the bloody regime. The agreement came after a history of attacks perpetrated by South Africa and its agents, the Mozambique Resistance Movement. These bandits are sponsored and armed by the regime to destabilize the economy of Mozambique and thus the economy of all Mozambique's allies. The Frelimo government of Mozambique was forced to expel African National Congress refugees with the understanding that South Africa would stop supporting the Mozambique Resistance Movement, but to everyone's surprise, the regime never ceased supporting the resistance movement even though Mozambique honored the Inkomaati Accord.

Mozambique was not the last victim of the stick-and-carrot tactic of the regime. This year a well-planned economic blockade managed to overthrow the anti-apartheid government of Leabua Jonathan in Lesotho allowing a pro-South African government to take control of that independent country landlocked by South Africa. The Leabua Jonathan government has always opposed apartheid and this never made the Botha regime happy. Because Lesotho is situated in the heart of South Africa, it became an easy target of South Africa's strong military and economic might.

The frustration that the regime is displaying, namely the mass killings within the black townships and the raids on its neighbors, is not new to us. We saw this in Mozambique during the Portuguese rule and in Zimbabwe, formerly Rhodesia, under Ian Smith's rule. This is a clear indication that the regime is failing to cope with the development within South Africa.

The liberation struggle is gaining momentum within the country despite the daily repressive measures by the regime. The new state of emergency has been rendered useless, thus strengthening the people's position. Mass arrests and kidnappings have failed to abate the determination of oppressed blacks in their struggle.

Currently, the regime is trying its best to confuse the outside world about the state of affairs within the country. The restriction imposed on the news media is a calculated move to this effect. In its efforts to divert the attention of the international community from the blows apartheid is suffering at the hands of the liberation forces, it focuses on incidents such as the so-called "necklace" — torture by igniting a tire and hanging it around a victim's neck — which portray the struggle as a situation where blacks are destroying each other.

We know that it is the regime that creates such situations by planting ignorant black informers amidst their brothers. Because many people lost their beloved ones including children, they are bound to carry out violent acts against any fellow blacks helping the regime.

The clashes between pro-government vigilantes and anti-government groups at Crossroad, a village settled by black protesters, is another situation created deliberately by the regime in its divide and rule endeavors to justify its repressive machinery. Crossroad has always been a thorn in the flesh of the regime; they tried several times in the past to destroy it but with little success.

Some years back the people of Crossroad were forced to face a severe winter when government bulldozers destroyed their homes. It is surprising today to see the government supporting the vigilante group, when yesteryear they called them "undesirable squatters." The truth of the matter is that the regime is trying to buy time by using a few ignorant people of rural background to set blacks against each other. This of course is the byproduct of the Bantustan strategy, which is geared toward dividing blacks along tribal lines. Government puppets like Gatsha Buthelezi, Kaizer Matanzima and Lucas Mangope, proponents of Bantustan policy, should be viewed on this background.

The vigilantes are a product of oppressive machinery of South Africa. Many people are still too politically immature to understand and identify the enemy tricks, and coupled with many years of subjugation and ignorance, they become an easy target for the regime's propaganda maneuvers. All these tricks and measures will have no effect on the struggle. The message is straightforward to the enemy, namely, that the black people are thirsty for their freedom, and they will stop at nothing to achieve this goal.

Rehnquist's integrity stands strong

MIKE RILEY
Guest Columnist

With the nominations of Antonin Scalia for Supreme Court justice and William Rehnquist as chief justice of the United States waiting for an almost certain Senate confirmation, we are allowed to pause and reflect on the attempted butchering of the nominees by the Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, specifically Ted Kennedy and Joseph Biden.

These two collaboraters of the "Get Bill Rehnquist Show" went all out in an attempt to find something on Justice Rehnquist to lower him to at least their level. The first card dealt was an attempt to charge Justice Rehnquist with not being sensitive to civil rights because it was somehow discovered that the deed to Justice Rehnquist's house in Vermont stated he couldn't sell to Jews. Rehnquist said he had never seen that exact clause, which, by the way, has been made illegal by a 1948 Supreme Court decision. Ted Kennedy hammered on this so-called "issue" for three days until it was brought to his attention that his brother, the late President John F. Kennedy, owned a home that had an anti-black clause.

Joseph Biden went out of his way to insinuate that Rehnquist's moral standards were out of touch and too extreme when compared to the "average American's." I would have to differ with Sen. Biden on this insinuation due to the fact that Rehnquist's moral standards reflect President Reagan's, whom the "average American" overwhelmingly re-elected to a second term. Quite simply, it is Joseph Biden's morals that are out of step with the "average American's."

Another charge was made by the Democrat minority members of the committee, who were often referred to on Capitol Hill as "the assassins," that Justice Rehnquist, while working as a poll watcher in Arizona in the early 1960s, had challenged voters. This accusation went nowhere as the lead witness, James Brosnahan, a former U.S. prosecuter, said he did not see Rehnquist challenging voters, much less harassing them. Kennedy and Biden, now somewhat perplexed in being unable to find a worthy charge against Rehnquist, stooped to the level of trying to question Rehnquist on the fact that he could not clearly recall the election "incident" in detail.

Maybe I haven't researched my topic enough, but I just can't seem to find anywhere that the qualification for chief justice of the United States is to have an elephant's memory. I doubt if I could remember in exact detail something that happened 24 years ago. I can, however, recall an incident at Chappaquidick.

In a last ditch effort to dig up some dirt on Justice Rehnquist, the committee assassins drove the administration to release confidential legal memos from the Office of Legal Counsel where Rehnquist had worked more than 15 years ago. To the surprise of few, nothing could be found that might tarnish Rehnquist's integrity.

One should note through all of this, that while liberal Democrats were attacking Reagan judicial nominees, Judge Harry Claiborne, a liberal Carter appointment to the federal bench, had been convicted of a felony and is in prison still drawing his full salary.

By the time Antonin Scalia's nomination came before the committee, the staff of professional muckrakers brought together by Kennedy and Biden were unable to dig up anything the trigger happy press corps could grasp. Scalia sailed through his nomination hearings unscathed by the McCarthy-style tactics that Kennedy and Biden tried on Rehnquist.

The bottom line is that Rehnquist and Scalia are excellent nominees for the highest court in the land. Both are widely respected as justices and legal scholars. In summarizing Kennedy and Biden's actions, I think that the Wall Street Journal stated it best in a Aug. 6 editorial: "What emerges as the issue is not the character of the nominee, but the character of the senators."

Device could prevent aerial collisions

Installation may be 2 years away

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The technology that would warn pilots of an impending aerial collision is known, but efforts to install the devices into commercial jets have been marked by years of contention and, critics say, government footdragging.

The collision of an Aeromexico DC-9 and a single-engine private plane over a Los Angeles suburb this week has directed renewed attention to the need for sophisticated airborne collision avoidance systems for the industry's fleet of 3,000 commercial jetliners.

But it may well be another two years before the devices are ready for widespread use, although Federal Aviation Administration officials acknowledge that the technical problems have been solved after some 20 years of research and development.

The so-called "T-CAS," or traffic alert and collision avoidance system, which is installed in the cockpit, uses radar and computers to track nearby aircraft and provide both a visual and verbal warning to the pilot of any plane that might pose a threat. It also provides suggested evasive maneuvers as the intruder plane gets closer.

Small aircraft would not need the sophistcated T-CAS, which has been estimated to cost as much as $100,000, as long as they have a transponder that has altitude reporting capability. About half of the 220,000 small private planes now have such transponders, although the single-engine Piper aircraft involved in this week's California collision apparently did not.

FAA Administrator Donald Engen acknowledges the collision avoidance technology has been proven to be effective, but he says it still needs to be tested in the real-world environment — testing that is not expected to be concluded until 1988.

A protype T-CAS system has been installed in a Piedmont Airlines Boeing 727 and will be in use on passenger-carrying flights before the end of the year, the agency said. Those flights were to have started early this year, but were pushed back because of questions about pilot training, aviation sources said.

Next year United Airlines and Northwest Airlines also will test a small number of T-CAS prototypes in a year-long program.

The average air traveler may be surprised that something as basic as an alarm to warn pilots of a nearby aircraft has not long been a part of every commercial aircraft's hardware.

Aviation officials first began talking about such a device in the 1950s after the collision of two jetliners over the Grand Canyon. The actual research and development of the T-CAS system and its various predecessors goes back more than 20 years.

Engen says the FAA is moving ahead as fast as possible to certify the devices, variations of which have been developed by two separate companies, and that he is committed to the sophisticated radar and computer technology that could prevent many aerial collisions.

But critics have said the FAA has not been forceful enough over the years to push the technology and at times has been too quick to move toward a more sophisticated device at the expense of making available to airlines a simpler technology ready to go.

Five years ago, says Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Kan., he was assured that the technological bugs had been solved in the collision avoidance systems and that the devices would be in commercial jetliners within a few years.

"Nothing has happened. Frankly it hasn't happened because the FAA hasn't pushed it and because some folks in the aviation industry don't want to deal with the cost of it," said Glickman in an interview.

Henry Duffy, president of the 33,000-member Air Line Pilots Associaton, also complains that the FAA has had a record of "getting bogged down" in developing T-CAS.

FCC opts to replace controversial station

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Federal Communications Commission approved a request Thursday for a new radio station in Dodge City to replace one that stirred a national controversy by airing racial hate programs.

The action by FCC administrative law judge John Frysiak will end a three-year licensing dispute over the 100,000-watt station in western Kansas, formerly called KTTL-FM.

John Kamp, FCC director of public affairs, said the commission would issue the decision on Friday. The judge's office confirmed that the order was signed on Thursday.

The order, which is subject to appeal, approves a settlement between Charles Babbs, the owner of the station now called KMCS-FM, and a group of Dodge City residents who intend to operate the new station.

Under the settlement, which was proposed last month, the Dodge City group, Community Service Broadcasting Inc., paid Babbs $10,000 for abandoning his efforts to renew the operating license of the station and asked the commission to approve its competing license application.

Bruce Eisen, attorney for Community Service, said the group intends to take over the facilities of the station and start broadcasting as soon as possible on the 93.9 frequency used by KMCS.

The group has made arrangements for use the station's tower but he said no final terms have been reached on renting or acquiring other equipment, which was leased by Babbs.

License renewal is usually a routine matter for a broadcaster, but the Dodge City station's case attracted national attention after civil rights groups and Kansas officials raised objections because of taped programs aired in 1982 and 1983 that were filled with attacks on Jews, blacks and other minorities.

Babbs has blamed his ex-wife, Nellie Babbs, for broadcasting the programs, which were produced by two self-described ministers, one of which was associated with the Posse Comitatus, a right-wing paramilitary group.

Last year, the commission ruled that the hate programs were not grounds to revoke the station's license because the broadcasts were protected by the constitutional right of free speech.

The Babbses were granted a divorce after the case came before the commission and Charles Babbs was awarded control of the station in an October 1985 property division. Mrs. Babbs is reported to have moved to Missouri.

Hearings were conducted in April in Dodge City to consider whether to renew the station's license held by Babbs or to to grant it to Community Service. Babbs approached Community Service earlier this summer about a possible deal to end the case and the settlement was filed with the commission last month.

No opposition surfaced to the settlement.

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith, which opposed renewal of KTTL's license, called the decision a "significant victory."

Daniloff says swap is inappropriate

Reporter rejects U.S. spy suspect trade

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Nicholas S. Daniloff, the U.S. News & World Report correspondent jailed in Moscow, doesn't want to be traded for a Soviet spy suspect, his editor said Thursday after returning from the Soviet Union.

A State Department official in Washington said the Soviet government has not responded to the U.S. proposal to exchange Daniloff, accused by the Soviets of spying, for an understanding that a Soviet physicist accused of spying in the United States would be sent home after his trial.

Mortimer Zuckerman, the owner and editor-in-chief of U.S. News & World Report, said Daniloff was buoyed by public support, but "didn't feel it was appropriate for him to be swapped for someone clearly involved in espionage."

"He is no more a spy than John Wayne, no more involved in espionage than Gidget or any of us and it's outrageous he's kept in prison," Zuckerman said as he arrived home from Moscow.

The deal to liberate Daniloff would involve temporarily releasing Gennadiy F. Zakharov, a physicist who was assigned to the United Nations Secretariat, the Soviet ambassador, U.S. officials said Wednesday.

State Department spokesman Charles E. Redman said the United States is "taking every appropriate measure, using every appropriate diplomatic contact and channel" in an effort to secure Daniloff's release.

Redman said the Soviet's "failure to resolve this satisfactorily cannot help but have a negative effect on U.S.-Soviet relations."

Another U.S. official, who demanded anonymity, said the correspondent was, in effect, "a hostage" and that the Soviets appeared unable to decide how to respond to the U.S. proposal.

Daniloff, who has not been formally charged, was arrested in a Moscow park after a Soviet acquaintance who had accepted several Stephen King novels from Daniloff more than a year ago handed him a packet that the correspondent "didn't ask for or anticipate."

Daniloff had not heard from the man in more than a year until receiving three phone calls shortly after the Aug. 23 arrest of Zakharov, Zuckerman said.

He said the packet handed to Daniloff contained Soviet newspaper articles indicating how Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev was being received in the provinces, poor quality photographs that the magazine had rejected when they were previously offered and two 35-millimeter negatives containing two maps which the KGB said were top secret.

University professor wins at film festival

By The Collegian Staff

A slide show produced entirely at K-State won a creative excellence award at a recent U.S. Industrial Film Festival in Chicago.

Martha B. Stone, associate professor of foods and nutrition and producer of the slide show titled "Food Additives — Who Needs Them?," said the film festival is the leading showcase for non-theatrical projects. More than 1,000 entries from 22 countries were submitted.

Stone produced the slide show for the Institute of Food Technologists, a professional group that provides information on food-related topics to educational and professional communities and the media. She serves as IFT's national chairman of regional communicators.

Stone took over the project in 1984 and, with the help of graduate students, finalized the script and put together the visuals. All of the photography for the 107 slides was done on campus.

"Food Additives — Who Needs Them?" was designed to provide an understanding of the use of food additives to consumers, she said.

Man dies from cyanide-laced soup mix

By The Associated Press

RUNNEMEDE, N.J. — A man who died from cyanide-laced Lipton Cup-A-Soup his mother bought to soothe his upset stomach could have been a random victim, but investigators also looked Thursday for someone out to get him or the store.

"Everybody at this point is a suspect," the county prosecutor said.

The death was the sixth from product tampering this year, but the first related to a food product since the wave of tamperings began with cyanide-filled Tylenol capsules in 1982.

Camden County Prosecutor Samuel Asbell said there was enough cyanide in the body of Louis Denber "to kill a horse" and the case is being investigated as a homicide. But he said no possibility has been ruled out.

"It all points to a product tampering," said Larry Hicks, a spokesman for the soup's maker, Thomas J. Lipton Inc., based in Englewood-Cliffs.

He and the prosecutor said the tampering appeared to be isolated and local, and did not appear to have occurred during the manufacture or company distribution of the chicken noodle soup.

Asbell described Denber, 27, as "basically a very easygoing individual" who worked as an electronics technician for RCA Corp. in Camden.

"He had no problems with his neighbors or his employer as far as we can tell," the prosecutor said.

There have been no calls claiming responsibility or making threats, nor "indication of any retribution against the store or the individual," said Dennis Wixted, the first assistant county prosecutor.

Cyanide was found in the empty foil packet the victim's mother picked from a garbage can and brought to the prosecutor's office and in a second unopened packet in the box, Asbell said.

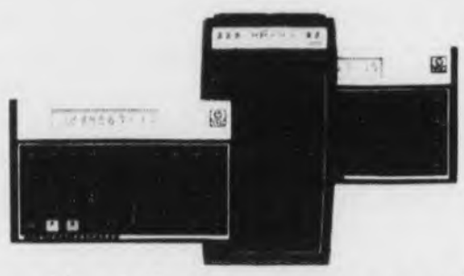
The box, purchased at the Shop'N'Bag store in this southern New Jersey suburb about 10 miles southeast of Philadelphia, had been punctured and the envelope slit, authorities said.

An official at the store said security was being increased.

No poison was detected in about 100 Cup-A-Soup boxes with the same code number — 6-C-13-GGF — pulled from the shelves of the store where Denber's was purchased, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration said. About 600 other boxes removed from the store were being tested.

No recall was ordered. However, Lipton pulled the soup from stores in the area and said area consumers could return the products for refunds. The New Jersey Health Department told county residents not to use or buy Cup-A-Soup.

About 200 people gathered for Denber's graveside funeral Thursday but family members asked that there be no interviews.



The victim's mother bought the soup Sunday, his girlfriend boiled the water at the couple's Runnemede bungalow and it was mixed by Denber, who was on a liquid diet because of an unspecified stomach ailment, Asbell said.

The cyanide is the same color as the soup granules, he said, but Denber told his girlfriend the soup looked and tasted odd and then threw it in the sink after two sips.

Parallel mentors test grid strategies

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Picture this if you will.

A new coach comes in to boost the fortunes of a sagging college football program. The coach comes from a winning background and promises to install an exciting, pass-oriented offense to lead the team to the promised land.

He's young, dynamic and believes his football team can win right away if things go right.

Sound familiar? K-State and Coach Stan Parrish, right?

Everything said could apply to Parrish, granted, but the words could just as easily describe David McWilliams, who enters his first year as coach at Texas Tech, K-State's opponent Saturday night at Lubbock, Texas.

Just as Parrish felt the pressure to win his season opener at home last week against Western Illinois, McWilliams will be in the same situation this week as the game against the K-State will be the Red Raiders' first of 1986.

"They'll be all lathered up and all excited. They've all got their cowboy boots and cowboy hats on down there and they're really raising Cain," Parrish said. "It's going to be a tough environment, so we've got to go in there with good mental toughness."

Texas Tech, 4-7 last year and 1-8 in the Southwest Conference, has been rated a 14-point favorite over the Wildcats. Included in that record are four losses to SWC opponents by a combined total of six points.

The Red Raiders' lone conference win a year ago was a 63-7 obliteration of Texas Christian. TCU beat K-State at Manhattan last year 24-22 in Lee Moon's first game as interim coach.

"We tried to prepare as broad a base as possible for (Texas Tech). We're going to have to make some adjustments at game time because everything we're doing is speculation to a point," Parrish said. "They haven't played, so we haven't had a chance to see them."

Parrish also said he didn't send films of K-State's 35-7 win over Western Illinois for Texas Tech to look at since the Red Raider coaching staff couldn't send anything in return. However, scouts from Texas Tech were in attendance at the Western Illinois game.

"That's why we kept on the ground so much in the last two quarters," Parrish said. "Obviously, we've got some things we didn't do. We'll always have a few little things for everyone we play."

McWilliams called K-State's playing last week "a distinct advantage."

"The first game gives you a chance to get some of the bugs worked out," McWilliams said. "If we were both experienced in what we were doing, then playing earlier wouldn't matter."

Parrish doesn't estimate what a win against Texas Tech could do for the 'Cats.

"If we could win this game and come home 2-0, we could be looking at more than anyone ever expected," Parrish said. "I think we owe it to ourselves to go down there and really sell it out."

Leading the Texas Tech offensive attack will be sophomore quarterback Billy Joe Tolliver. Tolliver, who possesses a strong arm, won the starting role near the end of last season. He threw for a Southwest Conference record of 422 yards in his starting debut against TCU.

Linebacker Brad Hastings is the top returning Red Raider on defense. Hastings, an All-American candidate, has been an All-SWC performer the last two seasons. However, Hastings underwent arthroscopic knee surgery Aug. 24 and may not see much action.

GAME NOTES: Game time is 7 p.m. Saturday at Jones Stadium in Lubbock...The game can be heard locally on KMKF (101.7 FM) or WIBW (580 AM) and on the KSU radio network...Linebacker David Wallace won't play against Texas Tech and is expected to be out for at least three weeks with a knee injury he sustained in the Western Illinois game...Defensive tackle John Crawford won't make the trip due to an ankle injury, but is expected back next week...Texas Tech boasts the smallest player in NCAA Division I football, 5-foot-3, 130 pound receiver Tyrone Thurman. Thurman is the current school career leader in punt returns at 13.5 yards per return.

K-State Rugby Club member Greg Barnes was selected as the most valuable player of last season's Western Regional tournament in Las Cruces, N.M. The rugby season will kickoff at 1 p.m. Saturday with the three-game alumni tournament at the L.P. Washburn Area practice field.

Rugby's best battles varsity

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

The best of K-State rugby from the past and present will converge on Manhattan this weekend.

The fifth annual rugby varsity-alumni game will take place at 1 p.m. Saturday at the practice field adjacent to the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area.

The alumni have apparently been practicing hard in their respective areas, said Jeff Stanley, public relations director for the rugby club.

"We've heard some vicious rumors about how they've been practicing real hard and want to come back and beat us," Stanley said.

"It's the best of the past of K-State rugby coming in and trying to prove they can still play the game," he said. "We're expecting players to come back from at least the last 15 years."

The rugby alumni weekend festivities kickoff with a welcome back get together Friday night, followed by a breakfast Saturday morning. After the three-game tournament Saturday afternoon, there will be a pig roast for the players and their families.

A minimum donation for the cost of the roast will be taken, but donations usually exceed the minimum, Stanley said.

The format of the tournament will include two alumni teams and two teams comprised of current rugby club members. The alumni teams will square off against the current teams, with the winners of the first round advancing to the championship game.

Last year, the alumni team defeated the current rugby club in the championship game.

Stanley said, however, that there is no animosity created by the rough-and-tumble game.

"Rugby is a game that bonds people together. You can be enemies on the field, and as soon as the whistle blows, you're friends again," Stanley said.

The current club, ranked in the top 10 nationally among collegiate squads, had three honorable mention all-American players last season.

Two of those players return to the team this year, and the squad also has most of its starting players returning from last year.

Wildcat fans can get their first glimpse of the women's volleyball squad this weekend as K-State hosts the Pepsi/Kansas State Invitational today and Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

In opening round matches tonight, Northwestern will tangle with Missouri at 5 p.m. followed by K-State-Northeast Louisiana at 7:30 p.m.

The two winners will battle for the championship at 7:30 p.m. Saturday. The consolation match will be at 5 p.m. the same day.

Even though Northeast Louisiana went 27-24 last year, K-State head coach Scott Nelson said the Wildcats' opening-round opponent couldn't be considered pushovers.

"Northeast Louisiana is a team that has a lot of great athletes," Nelson said. "The problem (for us) is that they have a lot of their team back. They have a couple of real strong players in the middle."

One of those athletes is Lynn Edwards, a graduate of Wichita North High School, who Nelson calls "a dominating player."

Nelson said he expects a high level of competition from the four squads entered in the two-day tourney.

Northwestern, "a traditional Top-20 team in the last five years," is the definite favorite in the tournament. Nelson also said Missouri is "real competitive" and shouldn't be counted out.

"One of the things that I'm really concerned about is the teams that we're playing basically return their entire teams from last year while we lost two starters (Renee Whitney and Donna Lee, seniors last year), and a third starter for us, Helen Bundy, is out recovering from (knee) surgery right now.

"So, collegiate experience is maybe one of the things we're short on to start the year with," Nelson said. "On the flip side of that, though, what we are ahead of, and I think equal to or better than the teams we play, is that we're big and we are physical. We have great athletes on this team."

Nelson, who has seven first-year members on his 15-player roster, leads a team which hopes to improve on last year's third-place finish in the Big Eight Conference. Nelson said he believes the team is starting to gel.

"The real measure is going to come in a match. That's where you can really evaluate what you have learned and carried over from practice," he said.

"I think we're starting to understand what things we need to do well to be successful, and that's something we've learned through practice. We're starting to find out where our weaknesses are, and once you know your weaknesses, you can play to your strengths and hide your weaknesses. That has been kind of a characteristic of what I've tried to teach our teams," Nelson said.

Nelson stresses that idea over and over.

"What I'm really trying to get us to do is play to our strengths, which are: serve tough, block well and attack the ball as a team. I think if we do those things, even though we may not be the best defensive unit in this tournament, it won't matter much," he said.

"I think if we play to our strengths, we can still be real successful."

Nelson said a measure of success is not necessarily winning the tournament at this stage of the season.

"I'm not real concerned about being 2-1, or 3-0, or 1-2 this weekend. I am concerned that we play as well as we can right now," he said. "If we don't, then it's hard to tell how good you are."

Nelson made a pitch to students to come out and watch the team. No admission will be charged to students.

"I think the people that have been coming to our matches the past couple of years have been discovering how exciting our brand of volleyball really is," Nelson said. "A large crowd Friday night is going to help us get to the finals of this tournament."

Announcers can't wait for Slippery Rock's season to begin

By The Associated Press

SLIPPERY ROCK, Pa. — Slippery Rock University, the little school with a funny name and a cult following, opens its season Saturday against Hillsdale, the NAIA Division I co-champions. And announcers at major college games across the country can't wait.

"We announce their score at all of our games. We do it religiously. They could be called America's small college team," said Bruce Madej, sports information director at Michigan.

"The name has a fascination. It turns people on. A presidential candidate in the New Hampshire primary would love to have the name recognition of Slippery Rock," said Beano Cook, a former ABC-TV college football analyst, now with ESPN.

Football at Michigan, Notre Dame, Oklahoma and other college powerhouses is comparable to a slick Hollywood production; at Slippery Rock it's more like a low-budget home movie.

The national fascination with the school, located about 45 miles north of Pittsburgh, began 50 years ago. In 1936, pollsters were divided over Minnesota and Pittsburgh as college football champions.

One writer satirically crowned Slippery Rock because it beat Westminster 14-0, which beat West Virginia Wesleyan 7-6, which beat Duquesne 2-0, which beat Pitt 7-0, which had beaten Notre Dame 26-0, which beat Northwestern 26-6, which shut out Minnesota 6-0.

Since then, the mere mention of the school's name generates chuckles at other college games.

"People just cheer Slippery Rock because they think the name sounds funny. To me, Kalamazoo is funny," said John Carpenter, Slippery Rock's sports information director for 17 years.

"This thing doesn't die. It's not a fad. It's a phenomenon," Carpenter said.

"We're not popular for the same reason as the New York Yankees or the Dallas Cowboys. It's more like why Catholics root for Notre Dame. I think a lot of people have adopted us," Carpenter said.

The school, which has 6,500 students and is one of 14 Pennsylvania-owned universities, could be Wechachochapohka University. That's the word the Seneca Indians gave to the slimy rocks they tumbled on while chasing British soldiers in 1779. The soldiers crossed they creek in hard-soled boots; the fumbled-footed Indians slid in their smooth moccasins, according to legend.

It could be a long day for Slippery Rock. The team lost 10 starters from a team that went 5-5 last year. Hillsdale, located in Michigan, returns 29 lettermen from a team that went 11-1-1, tying Central Arkansas 10-10 for the championship of the National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics.

But winning and losing seem to have little to do with Slippery Rock's renown.

"There's definitely a football tie-in to our popularity. But our sales are always consistent. It doesn't depend on how well our team does. Penn State can have a good year or a bad year, and business could drop off," said Stan Shedaker, manager of the school's bookstore. "With Slippery Rock, it's almost a cult following like some movies have."

In 1964 Slippery Rock played a regular season game in the Rose Bowl against California State College at Los Angeles. It also played in the Knute Rockne Bowl in Atlantic City, N.J., in 1972 and the national small college playoffs in 1974. ABC-TV made one of its games a regional telecast in 1983.

And in 1979, Michigan invited Slippery Rock to play Pennsylvania rival Shippensburg in its stadium.

"The year before, we had announced Slippery Rock was losing in the final minute to Shippensburg. Then we announced they came back to win. The crowd went bananas," said athletic director Don Canham.

Stiffer penalties should have been leveled against 'Huskers

TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

The National Collegiate Athletic Association announced Wednesday that it has suspended 60 University of Nebraska football players for one or two games.

The suspensions grew out of improprieties discovered by the NCAA concerning the use of complimentary tickets given to football players. Giving tickets to players is common practice, but those tickets may only be given to relatives and fellow students.

Although Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne has said there is no evidence the tickets were sold for profit, the tickets were still distributed in violation of NCAA rules.

The penalty, in my eyes, is in no way in perspective to the severity of the violation.

The Cornhusker athletic administrators and football coaches knew very well what the rules were concerning the distribution of tickets. If those rules were not communicated to their players a plea of ignorance just doesn't cut it.

Osborne has said most of the violations involved giving tickets to "girlfriend, fiancee, fiancee's family or someone they've lived next door to for 30 years."

Since almost all of the veteran players were involved in the case, I guess the women of Nebraska are heartbroken because there are no available football players, or they have real friendly neighbors. Come on Tom, what are we, stupid?

The entire state of Nebraska is screaming bloody murder and none of them have the right to do so.

It's time the NCAA start cleaning house with intercollegiate athletic programs. The excuse "everyone does it," will no longer work.

I would say Nebraska got off lightly. I would say if Nebraska had been a program where football success had been less frequent, then the penalty would have been much more severe.

Take a look at what has occurred here at K-State in the last year. The star player of the basketball team is found to be in violation of a rule and the NCAA states the school was not at fault.

Penalty: the NCAA does everything in its power to encourage the player to transfer to another program. A penalty that if it had occurred could have been devastating to the immediate success of the basketball team.

Now look at Nebraska. Sixty players outright break a rule — and there could have been no way the coaches didn't know about it.

Penalty: a one game suspension for the players. Essentially, Nebraska will forfeit its season-opener with Florida State.

If the program in question had been a less visible figure in the world of college athletics — say a Texas Christian, or even a K-State, the penalty would have been much different: four years probation, no television, no bowls, no national rankings and probably the loss of a significant number of scholarships.

I'm glad the NCAA is taking steps to clean up intercollegiate athletics, but it's time the NCAA look at the concept of equal treatment for violations by member institutions.

Gadhafi censures summit delegates

By The Associated Press

HARARE, Zimbabawe — Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi on Thursday denounced fellow members of the non-aligned movement as puppets and vowed to "undertake all types of terrorist acts" to defeat the United States.

Delegates to the non-aligned summit sat in stunned silence as Gadhafi described their organization as useless and an "international farce."

Gadhafi paused twice during his 75-minute speech to allow four young Libyan women in battle fatigues to chant "Down, down U.S.A."

Zimbabwean Prime Minister Robert Mugabe, who will head the movement for the next three years, delivered a careful response, saying "not all of us would agree" with Gadhafi.

Delegations from the Ivory Coast, Cameroon and Zaire issued protests after Gadhafi called their countries "puppets" because they have ties with Libya's arch-enemy, Israel.

Gadhafi said the movement did not do enough to support Libya after the United States bombed two Libyan cities April 15. President Reagan has said the attack was in retaliation for Gadhafi's alleged support of international terrorism.

Gadhafi threatened to withdraw from the movement unless all of its members severed diplomatic ties with the United States and Britain, which allowed U.S. warplanes to use its bases for the attack.

"I want to say goodbye, farewell to this funny movement, to this fallacy — farewell to this utter falsehood," Gadhafi said. Asked after the speech whether that meant Libya had left the movement, Gadhafi said, "Not yet."

Gadhafi vowed to defeat the United States.

"I shall counter it with an international army. I shall undertake then all types of terrorist acts...I shall not leave any stone unturned in the war to defeat this (American) empire," said Gadhafi.

He claimed Libya was under siege by 50 U.S. warships off its coast and tens of thousands of U.S. troops.

"This will never make Libya stop from the continuation of the battle of freedom and liberation," Gadhafi said.

Gadhafi has overshadowed the non-aligned meeting since he arrived Monday with hundreds of bodyguards who were disarmed.

After his speech, Gadhafi, followed by photographers, strode through corridors at the conference center to meet with President Ali Khamenei of Iran, President Fidel Castro of Cuba and President Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua.

The leaders of Zaire, Cameroon and Ivory Coast issued a joint statement, expressing "profound indignation and disdain at this senseless declaration of Col. Gadhafi."

Emissary's mother sues airline for $50 million

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — The mother of young peace emissary Samantha Smith has sued a regional airline for $50 million over the plane crash deaths of her daughter and husband nearly 13 months ago.

The suit was filed Wednesday against Bar Harbor Airways Inc. A commuter plane carrying Samantha and her father, Arthur Smith, crashed in rain and fog Aug. 25, 1985, at the Auburn-Lewiston Airport in Maine, killing eight people.

Samantha had attracted international attention by writing to then-Soviet leader Yuri Andropov, mentioning her fears about the possibility of nuclear war. Andropov replied by inviting her to visit his country, which she and her family did in 1983.

At the time of their deaths, Samantha and her father, a college English professor, were en route home from England where Samantha, 13, had been filming a segment of the short-lived television series "Lime Street."

Jane Smith is seeking $20 million in compensatory damages and $30 million in punitive damages, alleging negligence and "willful, wanton and reckless misconduct" on the part of Bar Harbor Airways, said her attorney, Edgar F. Heiskell III.

The suit was filed at the Suffolk County Superior Court in Boston, not in Bangor, Maine, where the airline is based, because the plane tickets were purchased in Boston, Heiskell said.

Heiskell, 45, who described himself as a family friend and former Air Force pilot, alleged Bar Harbor Airlines failed to properly train and control the flight crew.

Bar Harbor Airways Inc. operates through its two branches, Bar Harbor Airlines and Eastern Express Airlines. Bar Harbor Airlines is now primarily a freight service, and Eastern Express operates passenger flights under a working arrangement with Eastern Airlines.

Bar Harbor General Manager Gary Linscott said the company had no comment on the suit.

Heiskell alleged the pilot violated normal procedure by attempting to land without having the runway in sight. The pilot should have made a missed approach, climbing and circling the area until he spotted the runway, he said.

Bar Harbor also allegedly failed to maintain the aircraft's instrument landing system which "had been rendered inoperable or unreliable" during flights in the rain.

"The suit alleges gross negligence and willful, wanton and reckless misconduct in the airlines operation as a common carrier," said Heiskell. "The suit seeks compensatory damages in an amount in excess of $20 million and punitive damages...of $30 million."

The National Transportation Safety Board has not released its report on the cause of the crash, he said, adding: "We have conducted our own investigation. That is the basis of our suit."

Von Bulow's heirs refuse to drop case

By The Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Claus von Bulow said Thursday he agreed to divorce his comatose wife provided his stepchildren dropped their civil suit against him and split their inheritance with his daughter, but the offer was rejected.

The Danish-born socialite, acquitted last year of twice trying to kill his heiress wife, Martha "Sunny" von Bulow, also said the offer included his renouncing of any claims on his estimated $14 million share of her $75 million gas and utilities fortune, her Newport mansion and their luxurious New York apartment.

"I agreed to any formula that would take me out of the picture and give Cosima her fair share, including divorce," von Bulow said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press from the Fifth Avenue apartment. "It was turned down categorically. This is confidential information. I can't discuss it more."

Alexander von Auersperg and his sister, Annie-Laurie "Ala" von Auersperg Kneissl, von Bulow's children by a previous marriage, have fought von Bulow's efforts to reinstate Cosima von Bulow's claim to her share of the $50 million estate left by von Bulow's mother, the late Annie Laurie Crawford Aitken.

They have also sought to void von Bulow's interest in his wife's estate and force him to repay any money and return any property he has received from her estate since her first coma in 1979.

Before Aitken's death — and before the 1985 retrial of von Bulow that ended in his acquittal — she disinherited Miss von Bulow because her granddaughter stood by her father during his four-year ordeal.

The stepchildren also have prevented their half-sister from using Clarendon Court, the palatial Newport mansion.

Von Bulow said Thursday he made the settlement offer about four months ago, and received the rejection two weeks ago.

Michael Armstrong, the New York lawyer who represents the stepchildren, told WJAR-TV of Providence that the offer was turned down because of loopholes he said would have allowed Miss von Bulow to funnel money to her father.

The stepchildren filed the $56 million civil suit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan last year following von Bulow's acquittal by a Rhode Island Superior Court jury after a widely publicized nine-week trial.

The state Supreme Court had reversed von Bulow's 1982 conviction on charges he twice caused his wife to lapse into comas by injecting her with insulin. The second coma is considered irreversible.

Von Bulow, 59, on Wednesday won additional time to prepare for the suit, which, like the criminal case, contends he caused his wife's comas in a bid to kill her so he could inherit her riches and marry his mistress.

Dole delays bid for presidency

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole said Thursday he won't decide until spring whether to make a bid for the presidency, but Kansans should be thinking about a scenario that could come about if he does get the GOP nomination and resign from the Senate.

Dole said someone came up with a hypothetical situation that had the Senate deadlocked at 50 Republicans and 50 Democrats following the 1986 general election. If Kansas elects a Democrat governor and Dole gets the GOP nomination under those circumstances, the governor could appoint a Democrat to the Senate when Dole resigned to run for president.

The Kansas Republican was quick to say he doesn't think that is a likely scenario because he believes the GOP will be able to retain its majority in the Senate. It still is worth thinking about, however, when trying to decide whether to vote for state House Speaker Mike Hayden, a Republican, or Lt. Gov. Tom Docking, his Democratic opponent in the gubernatorial race, he said.

Dole answered questions for reporters during an impromptu news conference following a noon speech to the 1986 Kansas Conference on Federal Procurement and Export Opportunities. In conjunction with the conference, the senator announced a $97,000 federal grand to Wichita State University's Small Business Development Center so it can help Kansas businesses get federal contracts.

At this time the chance he will get the GOP presidential nomination is remote, Dole said.

He said a recent Nebraska newspaper poll showed Vice President George Bush with 31 percent of the GOP vote and Dole with 18 percent, up from 4 percent a year ago. Dole said Bush isn't moving up in the polls across the nation and neither are the other Republican contenders.

"My own view is that there may be an opportunity there," Dole said.

Gap between rural, urban income increases for first time in 20 years

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The income gap between rural and urban residents is increasing for the first time in two decades, according to a report by the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City.

Income per person averaged almost $14,000 for residents of urban counties in 1984, the report said. Average income per person in rural counties was about $10,000 — 35 percent less than city workers.

The study also said agriculture was not the only industry affected by a depressed rural economy. Banking, manufacturing, mining and other industries important to rural communities also are in trouble, the study said.

The report was written by Mark Drabenstott and Lynn Gibson of the Kansas City Fed and Mark Henry, a professor of agricultural economics at Clemson University who is a visiting scholar at the bank. The study, based on data collected by the federal agriculture, commerce and labor departments, found that:

—Manufacturing, not agriculture, is the greatest mainstay of rural counties, accounting for 36 percent of non-metropolitan income.

—Farming, retirement and government each account for about 12 percent of non-metropolitan income. However, farm-related incomes are of greater importance in the Midwest.

—Traditional mainstays of the rural economy, such as farmin, lumber, mining, energy and manufacturing, remain depressed because of foreign competition, the strong dollar and weak world markets.

The economic downturn of the early 1980s caused high interest rates and a sluggish demand for farm and manufactured products in rural areas, the study said. Eventually, many manufacturing jobs were lost to cheaper work forces overseas, particularly in textiles and other rural labor-intensive industries.

Severe problems in energy industries also added to the woes of rural areas, where many jobs in those industries are situated.

point of being ready for publication in four years, with almost no mistakes, consistency of the highest level and cross-checking of all sorts."

Ottenheimer began compiling lists of Shinzwani words in 1967 when she and her husband, Martin, first went to the Comoros for a year of field research on Comorian culture. In the years since then, they have visited the islands two more times and have had Comorians visit them three times in the United States, she said.

She said she originally had not thought of a dictionary but started collecting notes in order to learn the language, which enabled them to do their research more effectively.

"You lose so many subtleties of the language if you have to work through an interpreter," she said. At that time, English was not widely spoken in the Comoros, and there were only three Comorian students studying English on the island of Anjouan, she said.

Ottenheimer and her husband intended to research specific areas but broadened their interests because there was so little published information available on the Comorians.

"While we went there to study specific things, we knew we would have to understand the whole culture," she said. "You need to have an understanding of the entire culture in order to know how the specific thing you're interested in fits into the whole culture.

"You find yourself needing to know about everything. You end up with a very broad knowledge — a wholistic approach.

"Anthropologists have to be open-minded, in general. You have to be prepared for great differences in the ways in which people view the world," Ottenheimer said.

This is especially true when dealing with languages, she said.

"For example, in English we have two categories of nouns: singular and plural. Possibly, you could add an uncountable-mass noun (category), such as 'water,' that is an abstract form," she said. "But there are Bantu languages that have as many as 18 noun classifications." Shinzwani has 11 noun classifications.

In the English language, each word usually has one specific meaning, she said. In Shinzwani, a word may have several different meanings with all of them based on the same concept.

"There is a word in Shinzwani that refers to the source of a river: ko (pronounced KO or KO-HO). It also refers to the base of a tree trunk, the part that is just coming out of the ground," Ottenheimer said. Other meanings of "ko" include the underground fruit of a peanut plant, crispy rice at the bottom of a pot and a mature female animal, specifically a goat or a cow.

"The concept is of emergence: emergence of the river, emergence of the tree," she said.

In its present form, the Shinzwani dictionary consists of 632 typewritten pages, and an English index for the dictionary has 172 pages, Ottenheimer said. She estimates there will be approximately 250 pages in the final published version of the dictionary.

"This is short for a dictionary," she said. "I'm always impressed with the fact that people in the past have had to spend lifetimes compiling dictionaries. Some (dictionaries) have taken several lifetimes, handed down from one person to another."

Ottenheimer said she hopes the dictionary will eventually be adopted in the Comorian schools as a part of their English curriculum.

"English is beginning to be recognized as a language of business and trade, and the government of the Comoros is encouraging students to study English," she said.

In addition, Ottenheimer said she would like to eventually return to the islands to work with Comorians on making the dictionary "more in-depth, wide-ranging and more specific in some areas."

Pan Am officials in Karachi and the U.S. Consulate estimated about 380 passengers on board Flight 73, which was to stop in Frankfurt, West Germany, after Karachi. Anil Batasa, Pan Am manager in Bombay, said there were 387 passengers.

In New York, Pan Am spokeswoman Ann Whyte said 284 passengers were on board. It was not immediately clear why there was a discrepancy in the number of passengers.

The flight was scheduled to arrive at Kennedy International Airport at 2:25 p.m. CDT today, according to the airline.

"We are aware of the reports and are monitoring the situation," said Peter Roussel, a White House spokesman in California with the vacationing President Reagan.

One of the American cockpit crew members, who spoke to The Associated Press by telephone from the airport operations center, said it did not appear anyone on the plane had been hurt.

The crew member, who demanded anonymity, said the plane's two pilots and flight engineer had escaped through an emergency hatch as soon as they heard shots.

The attackers told the cockpit crew, who had left the plane, to get back on board and prepare for take off, she said.

Suspect Still At Large

By SCOOP NICHOLS
Freelance Reporter

An unidentified subject, wanted in connection with an alleged conspiracy to help those in need in the Manhattan area, is still on the loose, authorities reported Thursday. The suspect, believed by some officials to be the infamous Karen Concern, is of unknown gender, race and creed.

The suspect is believed to be aged 18-73, although no physical description is available.

Karen Concern is known to be linked with the FONE crisis center, 1221 Thurston, Manhattan, The Fone is a non-profit organization established in 1970, which serves as a counseling center for K-Staters and Manhattan residents. This reporter has learned that the Fone's unofficial motto is, "We'll talk to anyone about anything."

While having been known only for its crisis intervention services in the past, the Fone is gaining a reputation of helping people deal with other problems, that are not so critical, Things like the frustration of a broken nail or the anger of getting a speeding ticket, while still helping people through broken relationships, academic frustrations and sexuality concerns among other things.

Karen Concern is a leader of the Fonees-members of the Fone Organization. While little is known about any individual Fonee, it is believed that all are caring individuals willing to give 3-8 hours a week to help others in need.

If you or any you know fits this description, please call 532-6565 for more information.

Tutu becomes Cape Town's new archbishop

By The Associated Press

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Desmond Tutu was installed Sunday as archbishop of Cape Town, the first black to lead the Anglican Church in southern Africa, and promptly used his new pulpit to assail apartheid as evil and unchristian.

Bishops, diplomats and civil rights campaigners from across the world were among the 1,400 invited guests crowded into St. George's Cathedral for the ceremony, which blended religious pageantry with a celebration of the anti-apartheid movement.

"We shall be free, all of us, black and white, for it is God's intention," Tutu, 54, said near the close of a sweeping 50-minute sermon.

The 1984 Nobel Peace Prize winner, mopping his brow as he spoke, condemned violence from both sides in South Africa's political conflict.

But he contended that "the primary violence in this country is the violence of apartheid."

"Our people are peace-loving to a fault," he said. "Would white people still be talking about non-violent change as some of us do if what they have done to us and they continue to do to us had been done to them?"

Apartheid establishes a racially segregated society in which the 24 million black majority has no vote in national affairs. The 5 million white minority controls the economy and maintains separate districts, schools and health services.

Tutu, wearing white robes and a gold mitre, entered the Gothic cathedral after giving a symbolic knock on its northwest door. The cathedral is across a tree-lined promenade from Parliament and President P.W. Botha's official residence.

Tutu was then led in a procession to the throne and formally installed as leader of 3 million Anglicans in South Africa, Lesotho, Swaziland, South-West Africa and parts of Mozambique.

To cheers from the crowd, he pledged to rule his congregation, about 75 percent of them black, "with truth, justice and charity."

In the audience were Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie; Coretta Scott King, widow of American civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.; and black activist Winnie Mandela, who on Saturday visited her husband, jailed African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela, at nearby Polsmoor Prison.

Following the enthronement, Tutu and Runcie presided over a rain-spattered but festive outdoor service for about 10,000 people at a fairgrounds stadium.

Choirs sang joyous African hymns and a local minister, the Rev. Ian Eve, urged onlookers in the grandstands to come down onto the muddy field to share in communion and be closer to Tutu.

"But no cigars or Coca-Cola," Eve announced over the public address system. "Remember, God is here."

Runcie, in a sermon at the fairgrounds, praised Tutu as a man of love, vision and peace and endorsed his appeal for non-violence.

"As no system based on brutal repression can endure, so no change achieved by violence can escape its damaging infection," said Runcie, spiritual leader of the 74 million Anglicans worldwide. "These are the lessons of history. They are the message of the cross."

Runcie quoted Mandela as saying Christ was an inspriation for all those who have fought "against white domination and against black domination and who have cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society, a happy place for all peoples."

Starting today, K-State students can register to vote in the Student Government Services office in the K-State Union. This will be a permanent outpost for the county clerk's office.

Marilyn Oertly, a deputy in the county clerk's office, said this is the first time they've had a permanent outpost on campus.

"We like to have accessibility to the students, and this will be one way to get to them," she said.

To register, students need to take an ID proving they are 18 years old to the SGS office.

"Students have to sit down and fill out the cards in the office," said Debbie Fields, senior in finance and part time worker in the SGS office.

Tutu becomes Cape Town's new archbishop

By The Associated Press

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Desmond Tutu was installed Sunday as archbishop of Cape Town, the first black to lead the Anglican Church in southern Africa, and promptly used his new pulpit to assail apartheid as evil and unchristian.

Bishops, diplomats and civil rights campaigners from across the world were among the 1,400 invited guests crowded into St. George's Cathedral for the ceremony, which blended religious pageantry with a celebration of the anti-apartheid movement.

"We shall be free, all of us, black and white, for it is God's intention," Tutu, 54, said near the close of a sweeping 50-minute sermon.

The 1984 Nobel Peace Prize winner, mopping his brow as he spoke, condemned violence from both sides in South Africa's political conflict.

But he contended that "the primary violence in this country is the violence of apartheid."

"Our people are peace-loving to a fault," he said. "Would white people still be talking about non-violent change as some of us do if what they have done to us and they continue to do to us had been done to them?"

Eurythmics' new release lacking style

By JILL HUMMELS
Contributing Writer

The Eurythmics' new album, "Revenge" doesn't even manage to get even.

From a band usually associated with fresh angles in pop comes a collection of mediocre songs lacking even the semblance of synergy. The album is uncharacteristically dull, unmotivating and disappointing for nearly all of its 45 minutes.

The strong point of the LP happens in the first 5 minutes, when "Missionary Man" acts as the saving grace of the 10-song effort. The song feels new and presents a different, darker view of the men who come to save the souls of the natives. The drilling harmonica of Jimmy "Z" Zavala adds the right touch, making "Missionary Man" the album's godsend.

From that point on the album is like a falling angel.

The potential was there for something great, but it was somehow passed over. Annie Lennox's wonderfully textured voice was not put to task. Background singers are used to fill in the blanks where her voice should be. Incredible, but true. The amazing range she possesses was forgotten during the songwriting process.

The album is like a rough draft. Some songs are all right. Others could be a lot better.

A few of the songs — "When Tomorrow Comes," "Missionary Man" and "The Last Time" — can stand on their own, but wouldn't stack up against some of the Eurythmics' past hits. The other indistinguishable songs on the record should have been reconsidered before they were made permanent. They suffer from repetition — over and over again.

The Eurythmics should have taken more time before putting out this underdeveloped album. Perhaps the inspiration the group has experience in the past will hit them again and provide the seed for some better, more innovative songs.

The album is not worth the $8 or $9 the stores will charge. Would I lie to you?

Tutu becomes Cape Town's new archbishop

By The Associated Press

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Desmond Tutu was installed Sunday as archbishop of Cape Town, the first black to lead the Anglican Church in southern Africa, and promptly used his new pulpit to assail apartheid as evil and unchristian.

Bishops, diplomats and civil rights campaigners from across the world were among the 1,400 invited guests crowded into St. George's Cathedral for the ceremony, which blended religious pageantry with a celebration of the anti-apartheid movement.

"We shall be free, all of us, black and white, for it is God's intention," Tutu, 54, said near the close of a sweeping 50-minute sermon.

The 1984 Nobel Peace Prize winner, mopping his brow as he spoke, condemned violence from both sides in South Africa's political conflict.

But he contended that "the primary violence in this country is the violence of apartheid."

"Our people are peace-loving to a fault," he said. "Would white people still be talking about non-violent change as some of us do if what they have done to us and they continue to do to us had been done to them?"

Apartheid establishes a racially segregated society in which the 24 million black majority has no vote in national affairs. The 5 million white minority controls the economy and maintains separate districts, schools and health services.

Tutu, wearing white robes and a gold mitre, entered the Gothic cathedral after giving a symbolic knock on its northwest door. The cathedral is across a tree-lined promenade from Parliament and President P.W. Botha's official residence.

Tutu was then led in a procession to the throne and formally installed as leader of 3 million Anglicans in South Africa, Lesotho, Swaziland, South-West Africa and parts of Mozambique.

To cheers from the crowd, he pledged to rule his congregation, about 75 percent of them black, "with truth, justice and charity."

In the audience were Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie; Coretta Scott King, widow of American civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.; and black activist Winnie Mandela, who on Saturday visited her husband, jailed African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela, at nearby Polsmoor Prison.

Following the enthronement, Tutu and Runcie presided over a rain-spattered but festive outdoor service for about 10,000 people at a fairgrounds stadium.

Choirs sang joyous African hymns and a local minister, the Rev. Ian Eve, urged onlookers in the grandstands to come down onto the muddy field to share in communion and be closer to Tutu.

"But no cigars or Coca-Cola," Eve announced over the public address system. "Remember, God is here."

Runcie, in a sermon at the fairgrounds, praised Tutu as a man of love, vision and peace and endorsed his appeal for non-violence.

"As no system based on brutal repression can endure, so no change achieved by violence can escape its damaging infection," said Runcie, spiritual leader of the 74 million Anglicans worldwide. "These are the lessons of history. They are the message of the cross."

Runcie quoted Mandela as saying Christ was an inspriation for all those who have fought "against white domination and against black domination and who have cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society, a happy place for all peoples."

the Renaissance Festival a feast of fancy.

One step beyond a towered gateway lies a land of 400 years passed, populated with an intriguing and lively array of citizens, artisans, traders and royalty caught up in the merriment and frivolity of a robust harvest fair.

Residents of the shire extend a hearty welcome to one and all, but be warned: Guests must leave the present behind as they enter the 60-acre hamlet. All remnants of the 20th century have been bannished in favor of an authentic re-creation of a 16th century harvest celebration. The Renaissance Festival gets under way Saturday in Bonner Springs, and continues every weekend through Oct. 19.

A benefit for the Kansas City Art Institute, the festival began in 1977 with 50 performers, seven craftsmen and a few volunteers who played host to 7,500 curious visitors over three weekends. This year the festival will celebrate its 10th anniversary by honoring its 1-millionth guest with prizes, including a trip for two to Europe.

The festival has grown to be the second-largest attraction in the state of Kansas, adding activities and demonstrations each year. Many of the villagers are travelling entertainers and artists who play a 16th century role year-round. Others come from all professions and lifestyles, and prepare for their place in another century at a special "Renaissance school," called the Performatory.

The inspiration for the Renaissance Festival is tied to the ritual of bringing in the final crops before the winter. In England, this celebration of thanks can be traced to feudal days and the social classes which evolved from that system.

This event, called "Harvest Home," was held to pay tribute to the bond between servants and their masters. The two groups united in a great feast to show their appreciation of each other and their combined gratitude to nature for what it had provided.

Re-living that revelry is what the Renaissance Festival is all about.

Whether just entering Canterbury Courtyard, strolling across Mermaid Commons, or making the way to Renaissance Downs, entertainment is everywhere. King Henry VIII and Queen Anne preside over the festivities, greet guests and take delight in the presentations of skill and talent displayed by their subjects.

More than 3,000 dwellers in authentic costume inhabit the village, happy to help the newcomer along, pointing out the prime attractions.

Along twisting, tree-lined paths, in shops and from carts, 500 craftsmen offer handmade wares such as pottery, copper and wood sculpture, jewelry, swords and knives, blown

Good role gives Keaton needed edge

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

It's not easy to tell from the newspaper ads what to expect in "Touch and Go." It might be just another comedy starring Michael Keaton, not much different from "Gung Ho" or "Mr. Mom," but that's not the case at all. While "Touch and Go" does have plenty of humor, it's primarily a drama — and a relatively quiet one at that.

Keaton stars as a rather self-satisfied professional hockey player, Bobby Barbato, whose private life is filled with one-night stands with women who'll "do anything for an autograph." But all of this will change after he gets mugged in the parking lot after a game. Bobby collars the smallest of the muggers, an 11-year-old tough guy, and instead of taking him to the police (the kid gives him a sob story) he returns him home.

After he meets the mother, Denise (played by Maria Conchita Alonso, who also starred in "Moscow on the Hudson"), Bobby becomes involved with her. But this means responsibility and that's exactly what he's always tried to avoid. He would just as soon forget about Denise and her son and move onto other things, but this family is a mess. The romance that develops between Bobby and Denise forces him to see there are other things in life apart from his own personal needs.

It's Michael Keaton's excellent performance that makes this film work. He doesn't merely give us another version of his hyperactive, motor-mouthed character. This time he gives us a genuinely sensitive characterization; someone who's authentic.

Unlike what happens so often when comedians attempt dramatic roles, Keaton avoids the temptation to mug for the camera. He uses an unusual amount of restraint and that makes Bobby Barbato all the more believable.

There's also a fine performance by Maria Conchita Alonso. A poor performance by her might have made the movie syrupy sweet, but she gives her character a solid

Tutu becomes Cape Town's new archbishop

By The Associated Press

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Desmond Tutu was installed Sunday as archbishop of Cape Town, the first black to lead the Anglican Church in southern Africa, and promptly used his new pulpit to assail apartheid as evil and unchristian.

Bishops, diplomats and civil rights campaigners from across the world were among the 1,400 invited guests crowded into St. George's Cathedral for the ceremony, which blended religious pageantry with a celebration of the anti-apartheid movement.

"We shall be free, all of us, black and white, for it is God's intention," Tutu, 54, said near the close of a sweeping 50-minute sermon.

The 1984 Nobel Peace Prize winner, mopping his brow as he spoke, condemned violence from both sides in South Africa's political conflict.

But he contended that "the primary violence in this country is the violence of apartheid."

"Our people are peace-loving to a fault," he said. "Would white people still be talking about non-violent change as some of us do if what they have done to us and they continue to do to us had been done to them?"

Apartheid establishes a racially segregated society in which the 24 million black majority has no vote in national affairs. The 5 million white minority controls the economy and maintains separate districts, schools and health services.

Tutu, wearing white robes and a gold mitre, entered the Gothic cathedral after giving a symbolic knock on its northwest door. The cathedral is across a tree-lined promenade from Parliament and President P.W. Botha's official residence.

Tutu was then led in a procession to the throne and formally installed as leader of 3 million Anglicans in South Africa, Lesotho, Swaziland, South-West Africa and parts of Mozambique.

To cheers from the crowd, he pledged to rule his congregation, about 75 percent of them black, "with truth, justice and charity."

In the audience were Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie; Coretta Scott King, widow of American civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.; and black activist Winnie Mandela, who on Saturday visited her husband, jailed African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela, at nearby Polsmoor Prison.

Following the enthronement, Tutu and Runcie presided over a rain-spattered but festive outdoor service for about 10,000 people at a fairgrounds stadium.

Choirs sang joyous African hymns and a local minister, the Rev. Ian Eve, urged onlookers in the grandstands to come down onto the muddy field to share in communion and be closer to Tutu.

"But no cigars or Coca-Cola," Eve announced over the public address system. "Remember, God is here."

Runcie, in a sermon at the fairgrounds, praised Tutu as a man of love, vision and peace and endorsed his appeal for non-violence.

"As no system based on brutal repression can endure, so no change achieved by violence can escape its damaging infection," said Runcie, spiritual leader of the 74 million Anglicans worldwide. "These are the lessons of history. They are the message of the cross."

Runcie quoted Mandela as saying Christ was an inspriation for all those who have fought "against white domination and against black domination and who have cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society, a happy place for all peoples."

core of strength. And Ajay Naidu, as her son, doesn't ham it up like many child actors. There's a hardness in his eyes that's real.

With everything the movie has going for it, it seems as if the screenwriters — Alan Ormsby, Bob Sand, and Harry Colomby — weren't convinced their story would hold the audience's attention, so they let the movie degenerate into a crime story where Bobby plays detective.

It seems the muggers who got away from Bobby think they've been ratted on, so they seek revenge.

This secondary plot isn't bad stuff in itself, in fact a whole movie might have been developed around it, but when combined with the romantic drama, both parts are weakened. And since the crime story is what brings the movie to its close, the ending is unconvincing. It's the kind of ending that sends audiences stumbling from the theater, confused over what they've seen and quickly forgetting the movie's good points.

To cheers from the crowd, he pledged to rule his congregation, about 75 percent of them black, "with truth, justice and charity."

In the audience were Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie; Coretta Scott King, widow of American civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.; and black activist Winnie Mandela, who on Saturday visited her husband, jailed African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela, at nearby Polsmoor Prison.

Following the enthronement, Tutu and Runcie presided over a rain-spattered but festive outdoor service for about 10,000 people at a fairgrounds stadium.

Choirs sang joyous African hymns and a local minister, the Rev. Ian Eve, urged onlookers in the grandstands to come down onto the muddy field to share in communion and be closer to Tutu.

"But no cigars or Coca-Cola," Eve announced over the public address system. "Remember, God is here."

Runcie, in a sermon at the fairgrounds, praised Tutu as a man of love, vision and peace and endorsed his appeal for non-violence.

"As no system based on brutal repression can endure, so no change achieved by violence can escape its damaging infection," said Runcie, spiritual leader of the 74 million Anglicans worldwide. "These are the lessons of history. They are the message of the cross."

Runcie quoted Mandela as saying Christ was an inspriation for all those who have fought "against white domination and against black domination and who have cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society, a happy place for all peoples."

Voters can register in SGS office

By The Collegian Staff

Starting today, K-State students can register to vote in the Student Government Services office in the K-State Union. This will be a permanent outpost for the county clerk's office.

Marilyn Oertly, a deputy in the county clerk's office, said this is the first time they've had a permanent outpost on campus.

"We like to have accessibility to the students, and this will be one way to get to them," she said.

To register, students need to take an ID proving they are 18 years old to the SGS office.

"Students have to sit down and fill out the cards in the office," said Debbie Fields, senior in finance and part-time worker in the SGS office.

Forms are available to register in Soviets indict American reporter on charges of espionage

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — American reporter Nicholas Daniloff was charged with espionage on Sunday, state-run television said, a charge that under the Russian criminal code could carry the death penalty on conviction.

Daniloff was believed to be the first foreign journalist ever formally charged with spying here.

Daniloff called the Moscow office of his magazine, U.S. News & World Report, and told reporter Jeff Trimble that he was indicted in a legal proceeding at Moscow's Lefortovo Prison at 2 p.m., Trimble said.

He told his colleague he was charged under Article 65 of the Russian Federation Criminal Code. This article states that those committing espionage "shall be punished by deprivation of freedom for a term of seven to 15 years ... or by death."

Trimble quoted Daniloff as saying he did not know when a trial might take place, but that he was told the investigation of his case could six months or even nine months if there were extraordinary circumstances.

"My case is moving into a more serious phase," Trimble quoted Daniloff as saying in the 20-minute call. "The charge of espionage puts it on a par with another case we know about."

He was referring to Soviet U.N. employee Gennadiy Zakharov, who was arrested in New York on Aug. 23 on an espionage charge. Daniloff's wife, Ruth, has claimed her husband was framed in retaliation for Zakharov's arrest.

Daniloff, 52, was arrested Aug. 30 moments after a Soviet acquaintance gave him a packet later found to contain secret maps and photographs. The news weekly magazine correspondent has been held since then at the Moscow prison.

A commentator on the Soviet television news program Vremya confirmed that Daniloff was charged, but gave no details.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov told CBS-TV's "Face the Nation" program on Sunday that a trial would be held soon but gave no date. Gerasimov spoke from Moscow via satellite before word came that Daniloff was charged.

In Los Angeles, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said President Reagan is reviewing all options.

"We want Daniloff's release and we want it immediately," Speakes told reporters in a briefing at the hotel where Reagan was to address a GOP fund-raising dinner.

Speakes said the United States still had received no official notification of charges being filed against the correspondent.

He said the matter could have "serious implications" for U.S.-Soviet relations but declined to speculate on what action might be taken.

He also refused to comment on

Agreement to allow University exchange

By CAROL LENKNER
Collegian Reporter

Two Paraguayan university rectors are scheduled to meet with Gov. John Carlin today to sign a new student-exchange agreement with the Kansas Board of Regents schools.

The agreement will allow an exchange of students among the National University of Paraguay, the Catholic University in Asuncion and state Regents schools. The original agreement only included K-State, the University of Kansas and the university in Asuncion.

The university exchange agreement is based on a law passed by the Kansas Legislature in 1971. The law permits Kansas to recognize educational exchange agreements with foreign countries. Kansas used this law in 1976 to make the original exchange agreement with Paraguay.

The Rev. Juan Osher, rector of the Catholic University in Asuncion, and Doveonefeo Gonzoliz Torres, rector of the National University in Paraguay, visited K-State Saturday on a tour of the state universities.

"A rector is the equivalent to a president of a university," said Mimi Smith, associate professor of foods and nutrition.

Smith has been active in Partners of the Americas, which is responsible for developing various exchange programs with Paraguay.

Paraguay has been linked with Kansas in a partnership since 1968 under the Partners of the Americas program. Paraguay is a landlocked, cattle-raising country, with a population slightly larger than that of Kansas.

Both Kansas and Paraguay benefit from the various exchange programs, Smith said. The main advantage for a Kansas student taking part in the educational exchange agreement is the opportunity to speak Spanish in a Spanish-speaking environment and to experience the culture of Latin America, she said.

The appeal to a Paraguayan student is the chance to study in a special field not offered in Paraguay and to receive more scientific and advanced training in certain areas, she said.

Currently, there are 22 students participating.

Governor applauds agricultural debate

By The Collegian Staff

In a speech to more than 1,000 high-school debaters, Gov. John Carlin said he was pleased the topic of agriculture had been chosen as the new debate resolution.

Carlin addressed the debaters, their coaches and workshop volunteers during a luncheon Saturday in the Union Ballroom. He said the workshop and resolution presented great opportunities for the problems of agriculture to be studied more in depth.

"We in agriculture can't help but benefit from this," Carlin said.

Carlin said that because today's agriculture competes worldwide for exports and is no longer self-involved, it should be directed with concern for agricultural issues on a global scale.

"For the United States to compete, we likewise should have government involvement," Carlin said.

Another important component of competition, he said, is the family farm. Without the family farm, U.S. agriculture couldn't compete internationally, preserve the soil and efficiently produce for local consumers.

The Kansas governor said it would be unrealistic for the nation to depend entirely on exports for agricultural profits.

Carlin said that although American agriculture is no longer a labor-intensive industry, it still affects every individual living in the nation.

"Farm problems need a sound policy which would be important to all of us as consumers and citizens," he said. "In Kansas we didn't have the No. 1 football team, but we did have more banks close than any other state."

After the luncheon address, workshop participants were offered their choices of more than 100 different sessions focused on agricultural topics and debate techniques. The workshop, organized by David Mugler, associate dean for the College of Agriculture, was the first of its type at the University.

High-school debaters all over the country will be debating the topic of "Resolved: that the federal government should implement a comprehensive, long-term agricultural policy in the United States."

Resolutions are adopted by a national debate board and will remain the topic of high-school debate for a full academic year.

Bennett to discuss grade-school quality

Education secretary to present lecture

By The Collegian Staff

Secretary of Education William J. Bennett is expected to discuss the quality of primary education in America during his Tuesday address at McCain Auditorium.

Bennett will discuss the need for American grade schools to upgrade basic subjects during his speech titled "Once More, a Plea for History."

Bennett is the 73rd Landon Lecturer on Public Issues and his visit coincides with former Kansas Gov. Alfred M. Landon's 99th birthday.

Plans call for the secretary to respond to media question following his 10:30 a.m. address. From there, he will attend a luncheon the K-State Union Ballroom with lecture series patrons.

He is the fourth secretary of President Reagan's cabinet to speak at K-State.

Other secretaries featured at the Landon Lectures include Former Secretary of Agriculture John Block, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger and Secretary of State George Schultz.

President Reagan spoke twice at the University, as governor of California in 1967 and as president in 1982. Vice President George Bush was a featured speaker last fall as well as NBC anchorman Tom Brokaw.

Nobel economist Franco Modigliani is scheduled to speak in April.

The Landon Lecture series is a tribute to Kansas' most distinguished elder statesman, Alfred M. Landon.

Gov. Landon was sworn in as governor of Kansas on Jan. 9, 1933, and was the Republican Party nominee for president of the United States in 1936.

He delivered the first lecture in the series, "New Challenges in International Relations," on Dec. 13, 1966.

Much of the credit for beginning the lecture series is given to former University President James A. McCain and William Boyer, then head of the Department of Political Science and first coordinator of the series.

The lecture series is sponsored by approximately 500 patrons from throughout the state of Kansas. Each patron receives a ticket to a special reserved section in the auditorium and a printed copy of each lecture.

Guerillas attack Chilean president

SANTIAGO, Chile — Leftist guerrills attacked President Augusto Pinochet's motorcade Sunday night, wounding at least four policemen, but Pinochet was not injured, the military government announced.

The attack occurred at 6:30 p.m. as Pinochet's limousine and escort vehicles were traveling through Maipo Canyon, 37 miles southeast of Santiago, en route to the general's country home in the canyon, according to the government news agency ORBE and the state television network.

Both said the 70-year-old president arrived safely at his residence at Melocoton as a large security force launched a search through the canyon for the assailants.

Neither report gave details of the attack or the kind of weapons used.

About 90 minutes after the attack, a man telephoned The Associated Press and said the attack was carried out by members of the Manuel Rodriguez Patriotic Front, a Communist guerrilla group.

"The front has not died," he said. "We failed this time, but we will not fail next time."

Pope condemns terrorist attacks

MAYEUR, Italy — From an alpine peak beside Mount Blanc, Pope John Paul II on Sunday said bloody terrorist attacks on a jetliner in Pakistan and a synagogue in Turkey had turned hopes for peace into anguish.

"It is necessary, without delay, to do everything possible to put an end to the incessant escalation of hatred and terrorism," the pontiff said during his noon blessing from the 7,687-foot-high rocky peak of Mount Chetif.

From his pulpit facing the nearby cloud-covered snowy peak of Mount Blanc, Europe's highest mountain at 15,711 feet, John Paul said he was praying for the souls of the more than three dozen people killed in the two terrorist episodes. He called the attacks insane.

He spoke of his intense sadness and offered his strongest condemnation of Friday's hijacking of a Pan Am jumbo jet in Karachi and Saturday's attack on a synagogue in Istanbul.

Bad water supply kills Sri Lankans

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — Contaminated water has killed 15 people in the past 10 days near the western coastal town of Puttalam, health officials said Sunday.

They reported at least 100 people have been hospitalized and said the illness was diagnosed as Shigella diarrhea.

Dr. Hector Gajadeera, health officer in the town of Chilaw, 30 miles to the south, blamed the epidemic on water from a storage tank piped through a 60-year-old supply system without purification.

Water-borne epidemics of diarrhea claim some 6,000 lives in Sri Lanka every year.

Dole to assist Nebraska candidates

NORTH PLATTE, Neb. — Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole will campaign for Republican gubernatorial candidate Kay Orr in North Platte on Sept. 21.

A brunch with Orr and Dole will cost $25 per person. Dole also will attend a $500 per couple event later that afternoon at the Joseph and Pauline Dye home at Lake Maloney, Orr campaign officials said Saturday.

Dole, a Kansas Republican, will speak at both events and will have a news conference at 1 p.m. at the Holiday Inn.

The Nebraska Press Association will sponsor a one-hour debate between Orr and Helen Boosalis that evening at the North Platte High School Little Theatre. The debate will begin at 6 p.m., the press associaton announced.

Nebraska Gov. Bob Kerrey will attend a Democratic fund-raiser in North Platte Sept. 20, Lincoln County Democrats announced earlier. Proceeds will support the campaigns of Boosalis and congressional hopeful Scott Sidwell.

Florida convicts cocaine trafficker

OCALA, Fla. — A man authorities consider one of Colombian's biggest drug kingpins was convicted of cocaine trafficking in a case that began with seizure of a plane carrying 1,267 pounds of the drug.

"In terms of the overall scheme of convicting traffickers, this is a red-letter day," Fred Schneyer, spokesman for the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, said after Saturday's verdict.

Jose Cabrera-Sarmiento, 55, who was tried under extremely tight security, faces up to 30 years in state prison. No sentencing date has been set.

"This is about the most significant narcotics conviction obtained in quite some time because this man had very few peers in Colombia based on the amount of cocaine he was moving," Schneyer said.

The Colombian national was extradited after an indictment naming 42 defendants in April 1984 charged he was the ringleader of a group that had smuggled eight tons of cocaine, worth $2.2 billion wholesale, from June 1982 to November 1983. The plane was seized at Ocala Airport.

"We are alleging Mr. Sarmiento is, if not the biggest, among the biggest cocaine traffickers in Colombia," said Schneyer. "In terms of drug prosecutions, the fact that we now have a conviction standing against him is significant because of the shear amount of narcotics we allege Mr. Sarmiento moved in the United States."

Harvard ends birthday celebration

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Harvard University's 350th birthday party ended Sunday with a thanksgiving service as crimson banners came down and alumni of the oldest college in the nation bade farewells.

The gala week was marked by a party along the banks of the Charles River and tributes from Britain's Prince Charles and U.S. leaders, as well as anti-apartheid protests and a tragedy for a faculty member whose husband was killed aboard a plane commandeered by terrorists in Pakistan.

On Sunday, the Rev. Peter J. Gomes performed a service of thanksgiving and remembrance at Memorial Church, while other churches in Boston and Cambridge also observed the university's anniversary.

"People are saying goodbye and packing up," said Harvard spokesman David Sanders. "Now it's time to clean up, which is about as big a job as setting up was."

A program Saturday night at Harvard Stadium included a narration of American and Harvard history by former television newscaster Walter Cronkite, who ended with his famous line "And that's the way it was," followed by a fireworks display to the music of the Boston Pops orchestra.

More than 27,000 people were in the stadium for the show, said Harvard spokesman Peter Costa.

"It's very exciting. I wouldn't have missed it," said Dr. Bernard Meyer of New York City, a 1932 Harvard graduate. "The week has been very inspiring."

NBC wins technical-Emmy race

PASADENA, Calif. — NBC was the big Emmy winner in the behind-the-scenes categories, capturing 15 awards compared to 12 for CBS, 10 for PBS and five for ABC.

The awards in categories for programs and individual achievement in the creative arts were presented Saturday night by the Academy of Television Arts & Sciences at the Pasadena Civic Auditorium.

Three NBC programs garnered three Emmys apiece.

"St. Elsewhere," the hospital drama, received awards for art direction in a series, costuming for a series and sound mixing for a drama series.

"An Early Frost," the NBC movie about a homosexual dying of AIDS and how his family deals with it, won for cinematography, editing for a miniseries or a special and sound mixing for a miniseries or a special.

"Amazing Stories," a weekly series created by director Steven Spielberg that delves into the supernatural, took Emmys for achievement in hairstyling for a series, cinematography for a series and sound editing for a series.

Pakistani leader says hijackers' punishment to equal crime

By The Associated Press

KARACHI, Pakistan — President Mohammad Zia ul-Haq said Sunday that four young Palestinians who hijacked a Pan Am jumbo jet will be hanged if convicted of hijacking and murder.

"They will receive the punishment that such a crime deserves," Zia told a news conference at Karachi airport.

The gunmen seized the plane at the airport, with nearly 400 people aboard, early Friday. The hijacking ended 17 hours later when the lights went out aboard the plane and the hijackers fired on passengers. Pakistani commandos were in control half an hour after the shooting began.

Fifteen people, including three Americans, were killed. Hospitals reported 127 injured. U.S. officials have said 17 Americans were wounded.

Zia said the hijackers would not be extradited to the United States.

The U.S. Justice Department on Saturday issued arrest warrants for three of the hijackers. U.S. officials said the warrants were issued as a precaution, but emphasized that Pakistan was handling the case.

"We have a very effective law, the punishment for which is the death sentence," said Zia who returned to Karachi Sunday night after representing Pakistan at the summit of the non-aligned movement in Harare, Zimbabwe.

Pakistani courts impose death by hanging for murder. The sentence is routinely imposed.

The president said the gunmen are Palestinians, ranging in age from 19 to 25. He said they do not appear to be connected to any government.

After seizing the plane, the hijackers had demanded to be flown to Cyprus where they wanted to free jailed Palestinian terrorists. The four now are being held at an army camp near Karachi.

Zia said he strongly supported the Palestinian cause, but did not see the need for actions such as hijackings.

"Such incidents do leave a bad taste," he said.

The president said he was completely satisfied with the way Pakistani security forces handled the incident.

"I'm very proud of them," Zia said. "It could have been far worse. Many more lives could have been lost."

Asked about reports that it took Pakistani commandos up to 15 minutes to reach the plane after the hijackers began firing, Zia called on Jehandad Khan, the governor of Sind province.

Khan said the first commandos were at the plane within two minutes and three commando groups reached it within three minutes.

"If the allegations about 15 minutes (were) true, several hundred people (might) have died," Khan said.

Khurshid Anwar Mirza, director general of the Civil Aviation Authority and the chief government negotiator during the hijacking, told a news conference Saturday that it took commandos at least 10 minutes to reach the plane.

Many passengers and other witnesses said they did not see security forces until some time after the shooting began.

Airport security officials said Sunday five security guards have been suspended for suspected negligence because they were guarding the gate through which the hijackers, disguised as guards, drove to reach the plane.

Over the weekend, Pakistani officials offered conflicting statements about the number of people killed and the fate of the hijackers.

Officials said Sunday that it appeared 14 passengers and a stewardess were killed. Previous reports had said a ground worker also was killed.

Officials also said initially that two hijackers were killed.

Zia said he did not know why there had been such confusion.

"I think reality will be found in the next day and we'll find out where the fault was," he said.

A Pan Am plane flew 217 passengers to Frankfurt, West Germany. More than half were to continue on to London and New York.

An Indian Airlines Airbus evacuated 89 survivors, including 15 wounded, to Bombay. A plain wooden coffin containing the body of the slain stewardess, an Indian citizen, was loaded aboard. A floral wreath was placed atop the coffin.

A U.S. Air Force C-141 medical transport plane flew 11 injured, including six Americans, to West Germany.

Families await hijack survivor reports

By The Associated Press

As survivors of the Pan Am flight seized by Arab terrorists in Pakistan dispersed around the globe Sunday, relatives in the United States waited impatiently.

Some families had to endure agonies of suspense before learning the fate of their loved ones in the 17-hour ordeal that ended in gunfire with at least 15 people dead, including three Americans.

In Newark, N.J., Dharmesh Patel said he only learned Sunday that his younger brother, Mrugesh, had survived the shooting and was hospitalized in Bombay, India, with a leg injury.

The younger Patel, who was returning to the United States for his senior year of high school, had spent the summer with his parents in India. Dharmesh said calls to Pan Am and the State Department yielded no information on Mrugesh's whereabouts, but his parents learned where their son was and called Newark.

"It's hard for me to wait," said Asha Reddy, mother of 12-year-old Siddhartha Reddy, in Sugar Land, Texas. "I slept a few hours last night, and I feel really sick and tired."

Her son was among 400 hostages taken Friday on the Boeing 747 at the airport in Karachi, Pakistan, but was unhurt after the plane's lights went out and the terrorists opened fire with grenades and automatic weapons.

"He jumped from the wing to the ground and when he landed he twisted his ankle," said his fiancee, Charlotte Moore, in Houston. "Then he couldn't stand up, so he had to roll from under the plane."

She said, "He told me not to worry if I saw pictures of him on TV with blood on him — that he had not been hit, but that it was a real mess."

She said she would fly to West Germany join Allison, who was flown to the U.S. Rhein Main Air Base in Wiesbaden.

Deev Bhandari of Houston, said he plans to fly to New York to meet his brother, Dr. Y.S. Bhandari, a New Jersey neurosurgeon who sprained his back fleeing the plane after the shootout.

Pakistani officials said at least 15 people were killed, including three Americans, and 127 people were wounded.

Pan American World Airways officials said 44 Americans, most of Indian or Pakistani ancestry, were aboard but that the list was not definitive.

Asha Reddy said she had booked a flight to New York to meet her son, but that he might be flown to Houston. "Tell (my mother) I love her and I'm coming home soon," the youth said in a telephone interview Saturday night from Karachi.

Dave Allison, 37, was among those passengers who fled from the plane's escape hatch Friday after the terrorists opened fire and Pakistani commandos stormed the plane.

The Justice Department on Saturday issued arrest warrants for the hijackers, charging them with murder, hostage-taking, attempted air piracy and aircraft sabotage.

White House officials said the warrants were issued as a precautionary measure and emphasized that the Pakistani government is in charge of the case.

"We want to learn as much as possible to prosecute if we can get our hands on these folks," said State Department spokesman Austrian, referring to the FBI involvement.

He said Federal Bureau of Investigation agents also wanted to talk to passengers to learn how to prevent similar hijackings in the future.

Earlier Sunday, a U.S. Air Force C-141 medical evacuation plane brought 11 wounded survivors, including six Americans, to Frankfurt for treatment.

Ambush by guerrillas fails; Chilean president unscathed

By The Associated Press

SANTIAGO, Chile — Leftist guerrillas ambushed President Augusto Pinochet's motorcade in a bomb and gunfire attack Sunday, killing an army sergeant and wounding seven soldiers, the military government reported.

Gen. Pinochet was not injured in the assassination attempt that occurred on a bridge in Maipo Canyon 25 miles southeast of Santiago, the state-run ORBE news agency and government television reported.

They said he arrived safely at his official residence in Santiago.

A man identifying himself as a spokesman for the Manuel Rodriguez Patriotic Front telephoned news agencies 90 minutes after the attack and said it had been carried out by members of that Communist guerrilla group.

"We failed, but we won't fail next time," he told The Associated Press.

The reports by the government's news media said the 70-year-old president was returning to the capital from Melocoton, his country residence in Maipo Canyon, when the attack occurred at 6:30 p.m. Melocoton is 37 miles southeast of Santiago.

Those reports said there was a bomb explosion and then gunfire as the preesidential limousince escorted by military vehicles crossed the Manzano Bridge over the Maipo River.

They said one of the wounded soldiers, a sergeant, was declared dead on arrival at a hospital.

Troops launched a search along the canyon for the assailants and police reinforcements sealed off the area around Pinochet's Santiago residence.

The attack came four days before the 13th anniversary of the coup led by Pinochet, the army commander, that ousted the elected government of the late President Salvador Allende.

It was the first known attempt on Pinochet's life since the coup on Sept. 11, 1973.

Last month the Patriotic Front kidnapped an army colonel but then released him unharmed four days later.

The front and another Marxist group, the Leftist Revolutionary Movement, have been blamed for killing 21 police and military officers and setting more than 1,000 bombs in sporadic attacks since 1983, when an upsurge of demonstrations against military rule began.

Last month the government claimed it had uncovered 50 tons of arms and ammunitions in hidden caches along the Pacific and it said the weapons had been delivered to the guerrillas from Soviet fishing trawlers.

Several thousand people were killed in the 1973 coup.

Activities Carnival attracts 1,000 people

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Program Council Special Events Committee and the University Activities Board sponsored the 29th Annual Activities Carnival Sunday evening in the Union.

The Activities Carnival gives all registered campus organizations the opportunity to inform students about their purpose and activities.

Kristi Roe, freshman in marketing, said she enjoyed the carnival and thought it was more than she had expected.

"I thought it was going to be for certain majors only," Roe said. "I had never heard of some of the organizations."

Many of the organizations used various tactics to promote their activities. This included illustrated slide shows, free pass giveaways to upcoming events, bumper stickers, video-recorded presentations and many flyers and posters.

There was even a drawing for a freshman to be the student body president for a day. All the promotions were to persuade spectators to stop and get an earful of information about the clubs.

Approximately 1,000 spectators attended the carnival, said Cindy Lund, graduate student in food science and co-chairman of the event. Lund said the number of spectators was about the same as last year.

Sheila Kefe, freshman in arts and sciences, said the carnival offered something for everyone.

Eighty-four tables were set up for the participating 88 organizations.

One of the organizations at the carnival was the FONE Crisis Center. FONE, which has existed for 15 years, works with students, Fort Riley personnel and residents of the surrounding community.

Jadis Paul, a FONE counselor, said the organization is always looking for volunteers to help with the program and the Activities Carnival is one way to recruit volunteers.

Although a lot of students benefit from the carnival by learning about the many campus organizations, Melissa Snyder, senior in marketing, said, "I've finally learned how to enter the free T-shirt contest by guessing how many candies are in a jar. I hope I win."

ST. GEORGE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF MEDICINE
GRENADA, WEST INDIES

St. George's University School of Medicine, with more than 1050 graduates licensed in 33 states, offers a rigorous, nine-semester program leading to the degree of Doctor of Medicine.

In January 1985, The Journal of the American Medical Association published a report which ranked St. George's number one of all major foreign medical schools in the initial pass rate on the ECFMG Exam.

70 medical schools in the United States have accepted over 630 St. George's students with advanced standing.

St. George's has received probationary approval to conduct clinical clerkships in New Jersey subject to regulations of the State Board of Examiners.

A Loan Program for Entering Students has been instituted for a limited number of qualified applicants.

U.S. shouldn't agree to trade with Soviets

The United States and the Soviet Union are at it again. This time the lives of two men are at stake.

Nicholas Daniloff, Moscow correspondent for U.S. News & World Report, was arrested Aug. 30 by KGB secret police after a Soviet acquaintance handed him a package that was later reported to contain classified maps and photographs.

Daniloff said he thought the package contained newspaper clippings and denied the spy charge.

In addition to this charge, Daniloff may also face charges on violating the Soviet customs code, because upon entering the Soviet Union, he did not report several pieces of gold and silver family keepsakes on his customs documents.

Formal espionage charges were brought against Daniloff Sunday afternoon.

U.S. officials proposed Tuesday through diplomatic channels to release Daniloff into the custody of the U.S. ambassador and to return him to this country.

In exchange, Russian physicist Gennady Zakharov, U.S. employee who was arrested by the FBI Aug. 23 in New York on espionage charges, would be released to the Soviet ambassador in Washington, with the guarantee that Zakharov will appear in court.

Zakharov was arrested for giving $1,000 to an FBI informant for classified papers on military aircraft engines and radar.

So far, there has been no response from the Soviet Union. And U.S. Secretary of State George Schultz and White House spokesman Larry Speaks both said no outright swap should be made.

The Soviets are angry about the arrest of Zakharov and said the penalty of imprisonment and trial is too high for such an unsubstantial act of espionage.

The Soviet news agency, Tass, said the Daniloff case is only a small-scale, "run-of-the-mill" spy case.

U.S. officials have expressed worry that this case will adversely affect relations with the Soviet Union on arms control and a second summit meeting.

But the fact remains that the United States government must try Zakhorov, as planned.

Should a trade be made without trying Zakharov, this country would look as if it backed down from its original intentions, and U.S. citizens living or traveling in the Soviet Union might be in danger of similar setups. Furthermore, should a similar incident occur in the future, threats of U.S. prosecution for Soviet spies would not be taken seriously.

A policy agreement must be made between the Soviet Union and the United States on how accused spies will be processed before the strain on U.S.-Soviet relations can be put to rest.

Internship experience would aid all majors

Internships are a foreign word to some, but for others they are required in their degree. For majors in which internships are not available, the University should work with companies to establish an internship program.

Hotel and restaurant management students have the opportunity to gain hands-on experience at the Holiday Inn Holidome now and will possibly have the chance at the University Ramada Inn in the future.

These hotels and other companies that offer internships deserve credit for giving students the chance to see if they are going to like working in their chosen field before graduation. As many recent graduates find, the working world is nothing like the classroom.

Internships can give students a sense of security that they have chosen the right career. It can be frightening to not know what a job will be like, and internships give students a way out before they are handed their bachelor's degree.

The company also benefits from internships because it can train future employees.

Although most internships are during the summer or winter break, some are during the fall or spring semester. Then, students must decide if an internship is worth missing a semester of school.

The opportunity for all students to work in their chosen field before they graduate would take a lot of cooperation from businesses. Businesses should start internship programs to benefit the future of the company and also the future of students.

Working with placement centers on campus or the individual colleges, a program could be set up in each curriculum that would include an internship for credit. This concept might help retainment; it is a way to show students the University cares about their career.

East-bloc odor found near Farrell

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

I've spent a lot of time in the last week thinking about East Germany. This in itself probably tells you more about my interests than I should be admitting: right now, most guys are drooling over tan lines and legs; I've been thinking about an Eastern-bloc nation.

I believe what brought about this brief perversion of my thoughts was the activity that's been going on around Farrell Library recently. For those of you who decided to stay in bed until the drop-add deadline rolls around, several hard-working men have been reroofing the library, and the odor from the hot tar smells a lot like the air in East Germany.

I suppose some petroleum product in the tar is responsible for this olfactory pleasure all of us real students have been enjoying. In East Germany the smell comes from the brown coal they burn.

Brown coal, or lignite coal, is a low-grade coal with a relatively high sulfur content (hence the smell) and has a tendency to emit more ash into the air than higher grades of coal like we use in the United States. If you were going to pick a kind of coal to produce energy, brown coal wouldn't be your first choice.

But East Germany wasn't left with much in the way of resources when Germany divided into West and East after World War II. One thing they do have a lot of is brown coal, and you notice its effects first thing when you travel into the East; the air stinks and the buildings look grungy.

My first look at East Germany came from the window of a train I took from Munich to West Berlin. I met a civil engineer from Brazil on that train who had also never been in the East, and we bounced from window to window like a couple of kids, pointing and staring as we discussed our impressions.

By far the most memorable moment of the trip came when the Brazilian turned to me and said, "My country is also poor, but it doesn't look so old and gray."

Unlike the Autobahn routes to West Berlin, which skirt the major cities, our train went right through some urban areas. Along the tracks in the towns, large red and white signs boasted sayings like: "Long live the international proletariat" or "Far from the U.S.A., away from the atomic weapons." Once, however, on the side of a building, I saw "AC/DC" spray-painted in black.

Now, my opinion of heavy-metal rock lies somewhere below my opinion of Ronald Reagan, so you can imagine how strange I felt when I realized this graffiti seemed like a bright spot in a gray picture.

A couple of weeks later, I was in the East German city of Schwerien and saw another interesting sign above the door to the government marraige office: "Long live the invincible alliance of the Warsaw Pact!" Pretty romantic if you ask me. Perhaps the government tied cans to a community tank painted "Just Allied" and gave the bride and groom a free trip to spring maneuvers.

One of the interesting things about visiting both East and West Germany is that good comparisons of the rival systems can be made. For instance, you don't see much litter lying around in West Germany, but in East Germany the litter problem rivals that of the United States.

But I'm not talking about differences between Germans and Americans; I'm talking about one nation, the Germans, split in half. One side keeps its streets clean like it always has. The other side used to do the same but doesn't seem as interested in keeping public property clean anymore.

I wonder what Lenin would say about the fact that the private society in the West takes better care of communal property than the communal society in the East? Probably that Germans are an exception when it comes to cleanliness, or perhaps that I'm making a big dump out of a little trash.

I think Adam Smith, the Moses of capitalism, might smile at the explanation an East German now living in West Germany gave me to this trashy puzzle.

That refugee said he keeps his land clean because its his land. In East Germany the land wasn't his. It was everybody's. So everybody else could clean it.

Winston Churchill once said, "The inherent vice of capitalism is the unequal share of blessings; the inherent virtue of socialism is the equal sharing of miseries." Some Western nations, however, such as Sweden or the Netherlands, have successfully socialized sectors of their economies to the benefit of their people. Others, such as the United States, need more communal, less individualistic economic goals.

But Churchill's words ring true for those nations that are forced to dictate communal development with a small elite — such as East Germany — or if we want to get to the heart of the matter, the Soviet Union.

A more rational explanation that explains why West Germans, Swedes and Dutch take such good care of their communal property is that they have a voice in creating and running their community. That's called Democracy, and the lack of it is the biggest problem the Eastern-bloc nations face.

Give those people a voice in their government and they'll decide for themselves if they want to stand in line for collective bananas or be married under a Warsaw Pact sign.

Or live in a world that smells like tar.

Illiteracy plagues American society

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

Wednesday evening was spent in front of the television, a fairly normal college career pastime.

After sitting through several NBC situation comedies, I changed channels to watch an ABC Closeup — "A Loss For Words: Illiterate in America." As part of Project Literacy U.S., or PLUS, ABC and PBS have joined forces in presenting the problem of illiteracy. Efforts continue when PBS broadcasts "A Chance To Learn," at 8 p.m. Sept. 17.

Statistics show that more than 23 million people are illiterate in the United States and 20 million more are marginally illiterate. That means more than 43 million of us can't read a newspaper, a job application, a birthday card, a wedding announcement, a shopping list — let alone write any of those.

As I sat in front of the television and heard those astounding statistics, my eyes wandered around my cluttered apartment.

I know my world is dominated by the visual (working in television and being a movie addict will do that), and I know a large portion of my world is shaped by the written word (I'm in mass communications after all), but I didn't realize to what extent until Wednesday.

What would happen to my world if you took away the stacks of newspapers and magazines, the book collection started in grade school, the record collection, the shelf of textbooks and professional material?

What would happen if the Irish Blessing hanging on my wall was a jumble of nothing?

Who would I be if I couldn't read?

What if the saying by Darwin P. Kingsley that my sister gave me didn't make sense? "You have powers you never dreamed of. You can do things you never thought you could do. There are no limitations in what you can do except the limitations in your own mind as to what you cannot do. Don't think you cannot. Think you can." Or the grace above my dining room table — "Lord, help me remember that nothing is going to happen today that you and I together cannot handle" — was a series of letters with no meaning?

What would happen to you if you couldn't read this column? If you couldn't write your own name legibly? or read the phone book? or a menu? or a street sign?

We take so much for granted, even the ability to read and write. But those are skills many of us have not mastered, skills extremely important in our information-based society.

Only 74 percent of us finish high school. Yet, in the coming years at least 80 percent of new jobs will require more than a high school education.

And this doesn't mean just reading and writing. What about basic math skills?

Out of 11 countries testing high school students' math skills, the United States finished ninth. Japanese students outscored U.S. students in math by 30 percent, although the differences may be linked to the fact Japanese students are going directly to vocational-type training instead of high school. Fifty percent of us compute at an 8th-grade level or below.

According to the ABC program, the barriers of race are becoming blurred and being replaced by a dividing line of literacy. "We're becoming two classes, one able to cope, the other unemployed."

The problem not only affects the people who are illiterate and their families, but the entire country as well. Productivity is linked to literacy. Secretary of Education William Bennett said, "Any job done by an illiterate can be done better and cheaper by a machine." Fifty percent of low-skilled workers will need retraining within the next few years.

PLUS is a federal program with local adult education centers at the grass roots of the project. Locally, the Adult Learning and Education Center, 2031 Casement Road, handles the majority of adult education. The center assists adults, through one-on-one tutoring, in studying for their high school equivalency test or in learning English as a second language or any other type of learning or education need.

Most illiterates find the inability to cope with everyday life the worst part. Most live with the thought of "Maybe I could have..."

Those of us who are (or claim to be) literate need to realize the extent of the problem, the stigma attached and the difficulty in seeking help. And we need to offer our support and assistance to our neighbors in solving the debilitating disaster of illiteracy.

Illiteracy is not just a national problem; it's local. It's not an isolated difficulty affecting only a few individuals. It is a problem that affects you and me and the people around us. Even in a university community, we need to be aware of the problem and strive to find a solution.

A 51-year-old woman was interviewed by Peter Jennings during the ABC Closeup. She is just now beginning to learn to read. Asked what she wanted to be able to read the most, she answered, "The Bible," and began to cry. When asked what was most exciting about learning to read, she said, "The new words. 'Bird,' 'wings...'"

Let's strive to give future generations the ability to cope and to see the beauty of birds.

Ag college to utilize alumni in effort to better recruiting

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This article is the first in a series on new administration.

The College of Agriculture, in an effort to improve student recruitment, will draw on the resources of new faculty and a network of alumni.

The college hired William Amstein, a 1952 K-State graduate from Clifton, as ag alumni coordinator, said Walter Woods, dean of agriculture.

Change of 'State'

"This new position will have Amstein working with K-State ag alumni to strengthen the working relationship in areas of recruitment, teaching and extension," Woods said.

Amstein previously farmed and ranched at his home in Clifton. He has a bachelor's degree in agricultural economics and a masters degree in animal breeding. Amstein served as president of the Kansas Livestock Association in 1973 and was the first chairman of the Kansas Beef Council.

Amstein said he applied for the job in part because of the "purple blood" in his veins and also because his father worked in extension at the University.

"Half of this new job will be to promote better relations of ag alumni in the College of Agriculture so they will help in the recruitment of the college," he said. "The other half of the job is an endowment to raise additional funds for scholarships, research or other special projects deemed necessary for the College of Agriculture."

The college as a whole will be working to improve its self-evaluation this year, Woods said.

"We have currently set up a committee to study the core requirements in the college and what those requirements should be," he said. "Several departments have undertaken their own reviews, and others are looking at course offerings and staffing patterns that will help them meet the needs of the future in their departments."

Woods said the Departments of Horticulture and Agricultural Economics have undergone reviews of this type during the past academic year.

Woods said the new faculty in the college will help move the agricultural programs forward. Nine new assistant professors joined the college this year.

In addition to Amstein in the dean's office, Ted Schroeder and Allen Featherstone are new assistant professors in the Department of Agricultural Economics. Before coming to K-State, Schroeder taught courses at Iowa State University. Featherstone was a graduate assistant at Purdue University.

John Havlin and William Heer join the Department of Agronomy. Havlin previously worked at the University of Nebraska, and Heer recently completed his doctorate at Oklahoma State University.

William Ikins, who recently completed his doctorate at Michigan State University, is new in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry. Marion Harris, who also recently finished a doctorate in entomology at Michigan State, joins the Department of Entomology.

In the Department of Horticulture, James Robbins is a new assistant professor. Robbins previously worked at the University of California.

Frank White joins the Department of Plant Pathology. Before coming to K-State, White worked for the department of microbiology and immunology at the University of Washington.

University ag research aids Africa

By The Collegian Staff

It is no secret that K-State is a national leader in agricultural research. Right here in our own backyard, a wealth of agricultural know-how exists.

However, beyond our back yard — several thousand miles beyond — K-State has passed on its agricultural know-how to many of the world's developing nations. Botswana, located in southern Africa, is one of these nations.

Funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development and implemented by MidAmerica International Agricultural Consortium, K-State has been conducting farming systems research in Botswana for four years, said Jim Jorns, assistant director of K-State's international agricultural programs and MIAC project coordinator.

One of the five universities which constitute MIAC, K-State is charged with the implementation of the Botswana research, officially titled the Agricultural Technology Improvement Project, Jorns said.

The research team in Botswana is comprised of seven K-State faculty members, with their research administered by the Botswana Ministry of Agriculture, Jorns said.

J. Wendell McKinsey, MIAC's executive director, said the team's goals are to assist the Botswana MOA in the development of "an improved agricultural research capability which will be responsive to farmers' needs and to strengthen the process through which research results can be disseminated and demonstrated to farmers."

Jorns said the on-farm research takes place in the Francistown and Mahalapye areas of Botswana. The major research activities undertaken in these areas include taking farm family surveys, testing plowing and planting techniques to improve crop stands and attempts at increasing draft animal efficiency.

At a cost of approximately $4.25 million, AID funds the five-year Botswana MOA project. The Botswana MOA, however, provides local transportation and housing for the K-State research team, Jorns said.

The team will complete the research in Botswana in November 1987, Jorns said.

Group plans to raise $10,000 to contribute to MS research

By The Collegian Staff

Students Against Multiple Sclerosis is back in action this year with plans to raise $10,000 to help with multiple sclerosis research.

SAMS was developed to raise money for a nationwide effort to "Bust MS." Multiple Sclerosis is a chronic, progressive disease that strikes nearly 200 young adults every week.

The main goal for this year is to reach $10,000 or more just in fund raising, said LaDeena Russell, senior in biology and campus chairwoman of SAMS.

"We want to hit our goal and be really positive," she said.

A rodeo, Rugby Benefit Game and Run for Hope are some of the fund-raising events scheduled for this fall, Russell said.

The Rugby Benefit Game will include a sweat shirt sale and a balloon launch. Run for Hope is a 5-kilometer run in October.

Proceeds from the events will go to the National Multiple Sclerosis Society, which in turn will filter money to SAMS and other chapters of the society.

SAMS is organized by the National Multiple Sclerosis Society and sponsored by Music Television. Last year's "Rock Alike" contest winner in the national competition received an internship with MTV and became national spokesperson for SAMS.

"Nationals keep track with the universities to see who does the est," Russell said.

SAMS has projected a fresh group of students for this year's membership and hopes to have more than 200 members.

"Some of our members have MS," she said. "SAMS brings support to people with MS and brings them together." Russell, whose father is a victim of MS, researches the disease.

The "Rock Alive," Kick-Off contest and "canning" money at athletic events are some of the activities planned for later in the school year.

SAMS also will be getting a new mascot this year. The group will meet at 9 p.m. on Sundays to discuss plans for upcoming events.

"SAMS encourages residence halls, greek houses and off-campus students to get involved," Russell said.

Landon to turn 99, looks forward to century celebration

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A cane is his constant companion since he broke a hip 3½ years ago, and his hearing and eyesight sometimes inhibit conversation. But time has not robbed Alf Landon of his keen wit, searching mind and insatiable appetite for information.

Landon observes his 99th birthday Tuesday, a milestone he never thought he'd reach. Now, he thinks he'll see 100.

"Oh, yes, why not?" he responded when asked during his annual birthday interview with The Associated Press if he thinks he can make 100. "That's just one more year. Yes, I think I can make that."

When he hit 90, Landon said he never expected to live to be that old. He said he would just take the birthdays one at a time in the 90s, but doubted he'd live to see 100.

"I've got to see how my political predictions come out," he said last week, explaining his new optimism about reaching 100.

"I'm a little more optimistic than I was a year ago. I think the country and the world are a little bit better off than they were on my 98th birthday."

As he turns 99, Landon is aware of his place in Kansas and American political history as 1936 Republican presidential nominee, two-term governor of Kansas and father of U.S. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum.

It was a keen sense of political history that prompted Landon to make a trip to the Kansas Capitol in July to look at the spot on the south steps where he delivered his acceptance speech 50 years ago after Republicans nominated him to run for president against popular Democrat Franklin Roosevelt.

Landon's grandson, Richard Kassebaum, was in Topeka to record that pilgrimage for a documentary film he is preparing on his grandfather.

Landon left candidate politics forever after losing to Roosevelt in a landslide. He won only two states, Maine and Vermont, but never showed any bitterness.

"I took it all in stride," he said. "After you've been beaten for the top man (president), why run for anything else?"

Despite his lopsided loss to Roosevelt, Landon lived to realize a special niche in American political history. He thrice was recognized at Republican national conventions for his contributions as Grand Old Man of the GOP, and party leaders have beaten a path to the door of his magnificent old Colonial style mansion in northwest Topeka.

Ronald Reagan came to Kansas on Landon's 95th birthday. George Bush came last year. Other visitors have included Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford and the late Robert Kennedy.

Reagan promised Landon a ride on Air Force One to Washington and a birthday party at the White House if he makes 100. Landon admits he probably couldn't make the trip, but would like to be around a year from now to be able to turn down the president.

Nobody of that stature is coming this year, partly because of Landon's frail physical condition.

But a tradition he cherishes above the visits of dignitaries will continue.

Upwards of 70 school children, teachers and school officials are scheduled to call on the venerable old politician at 2 p.m. Tuesday, reviving a ceremony begun nearly two decades ago.

They are former students of Landon Middle School, a former junior high school located about a half mile from Landon's home. The local school board closed the school last spring to save money.

The students, now scattered among three other middle schools, will bring a birthday cake and small gifts and will serenade Landon, just as the Landon School students have done since the early 1970s — when Landon no longer went to the school to accept the accolades of the students.

A student chorus will sing, and Landon is expected to make brief remarks — just as he has always done.

"The visit of the students, that's what I really appreciate," Landon said. "I'll be there to give them greetings, and maybe a word of advice. I don't forget that, because that means more than anything else to me...the children being here."

Sen. Kassebaum, three of her children, other family members and a couple of close friends will have lunch with Landon at his home Tuesday. Then Landon will await the arrival of the school children for the highlight of his day.

The lunch will feature homemade ice cream and cake, Landon's favorites.

Never one to let others tell him what to do, the frailties of age have not softened Landon's determination.

"They're still trying to tell me what I have to do," he said. "But I want everyone to know that I'm still, at 99, deciding for myself what I'm going to do."

Landon listed Sen. Bob Dole, Nevada Sen. Paul Laxalt, Indiana Sen. Richard Luger, New York Rep. Jack Kemp, Illinois Gov. James Thompson and former Tennessee Sen. Howard Baker as the leading potential challengers to Bush.

He also said he finds it interesting having television evangelist Pat Robertson pursue the GOP nomination if that is his desire, although he isn't sure how much support he can generate.

"So far, his political activity hasn't established him as a leading candidate," Landon said of Robertson.

In Kansas politics, Landon said he believes Mike Hayden can capture the governorship, returning it to Republican control for the first time in eight years. Landon endorsed Hayden in the GOP primary, a rarity for him.

"I see in Mike Hayden a candidate with strong grassroots support and popular appeal," he said. "I think he has an outstanding chance of being elected governor (over Democrat Tom Docking).

"My gosh. It's time Republicans elected a governor in Kansas, isn't it?"

Tech Raiders upend Wildcats 41-7

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

LUBBOCK, Texas — For 2½ quarters in Saturday night's game against Texas Tech, K-State was playing what Coach Stan Parris called "error-free" football.

Few teams can keep this type of play up for long, though, and the Wildcats didn't. Once K-State started making a few mistakes, the end came swiftly.

Texas Tech capitalized on nearly every Wildcat error in the third and fourth quarters, scoring 35 second-half points to crush K-State 41-7 before 37,842 predominantly red-clad fans at Jones Stadium.

"For 2½ quarters, we played pretty darn good football," Parrish said. "We made a couple of mistakes; they capitalized, and they beat us doing things right."

"They are a big, strong football team. They can dominate a team on either side of the ball. You've got to do things right. We didn't, and the gates broke open."

The first leak in the dam came when the Wildcats appeared ready to add to a 7-6 halftime lead early in the third quarter.

Operating from the Tech 29-yard line, K-State quarterback Randy Williams attempted a pass to Dan Hughes that was intercepted by the Red Raiders' Boyd Cowan. Cowan returned the ball 83 yards down the sideline and strode into the end zone untouched for the go-ahead touchdown.

"I really thought we were still in the game (after the interception)," Williams said. "Nobody gave up. When something like that happens, you can't just stick your head. You've got to turn around and come back."

But after the Cowan interception, the Wildcats appeared incapable of generating anything productive on offense or defense, let alone making a comeback. For Texas Tech, however, the play would provide the spark that led to a Red Raider rout.

"That play certainly changed the complexion of the game, and we were able to take control after that," Texas Tech Coach David McWilliams said.

The Wildcats also lost two fumbles in the second half.

"You can't give a turnover to Texas Tech where you could to Western Illinois," said K-State offensive guard Bob Bessert.

The second-half debacle occurred after a first half where the Wildcats appeared capable of pulling off the upset.

"We felt really good about it (at halftime). We thought we could play with them," Bessert said.

Defensively in the first half, K-State was holding the Red Raiders in check, giving up only a pair of field goals by Scott Segrist.

Offensively, Williams was hitting the mark with his passes, completing seven of 16 for 122 yards. Williams' biggest completion was a 46-yard touchdown pass to John Williams that gave K-State a 7-6 lead after Mark Porter added the extra point.

"We used an audible (on the touchdown pass)," Williams said. "If I saw something, I could go ahead and take it, and it worked."

Williams was also connecting with Hughes, who ended up with seven receptions for 117 yards.

Defensive knowledge to Hughes' advantage

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

LUBBOCK, Texas — K-State's Dan Hughes hasn't spent one second looking over his shoulder.

The junior wide receiver from Overland Park started his collegiate football career at the University of South Dakota as a defensive back.

After electing to transfer to K-State and sitting out last season as a redshirt, Hughes is now using the knowledge he gained from being a cornerback for two years to beat defensive backs as K-State's leading receiver.

"It's been a good transfer," Hughes said. "I'm pleased with K-State. I'm enjoying my teammates. We've got a great bunch of guys."

In K-State's 41-7 drubbing at the hands of Texas Tech, the 'Cats only managed 279 total yards of offense. Quarterback Randy Williams and Hughes combined for 117 of those yards on seven completions.

"I think that (statistics) had to do a lot with the pass plays we were using this week," Hughes said. "The number of receptions I get will be a week-to-week thing. This past week we planned on using weak-side passing (Hughes is a weak-side receiver in K-State's offense). We knew that going into the game and anticipated using it a lot."

Often on third down in the Tech game, Wildcat quarterback Randy Williams would look down the middle of the field for Hughes, who usually would be a step ahead of his defender.

"Dan Hughes is a great athlete," Williams said. "We can go across the middle and he usually comes up with it."

Coach Stan Parrish does not like to talk about individual players — especially following a 35-point defeat. But the first-year K-State coach had positive comments about Hughes.

"He runs a good route and catches the ball," Parrish said. "He does a real good job."

The soft-spoken Hughes wasn't concerned with his individual statistics. Instead, Hughes talked about his team following the Wildcats' discouraging loss.

"This is a very temporary setback," Hughes said. "We're going to regroup and bounce back next week against Northern Iowa."

K-State collars second place; Northwestern 'Cats earn title

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State's volleyball squad opened its season this weekend with a second-place finish in the Pepsi/KSU Invitational at Ahearn Field House.

Northwestern defeated the Wildcats 15-3, 13-15, 15-2 and 15-9 in the championship Saturday night in front of a crowd of more than 400.

"I think we had a real good effort," K-State head coach Scott Nelson said. "I think we learned a lot about ourselves. We learned where we'd like to be at. I think Northwestern played as their ranking, top-25, indicates."

A K-State victory in the second game of the title match, which evened the match at one game apiece, appeared to inspire the Wildcats of Northwestern as they jumped out to a 10-0 lead in the third game and never looked back.

Nelson cited Northwestern's superior serving and experience as being major factors in the match. Nelson, who has seven first-year players on his squad, said the gap in experience was evident but was encouraged by the play of those team members.

"Everyone contributed in different ways," he said. "The thing is, we will get better."

Northwestern, 3-0, was paced by the setting of sophomore Renee Duckmann and the fierce net play of sophomores Linda Cabaniss and Janine Makar. All three were named to the all-tournament team.

Rounding out the all-tourney team were three K-State players: juniors Mary Kinsey and Kristi Jacquart and sophomore Shawnee Call. Call, a 5-foot-11 outside hitter from Ellsworth, was tabbed as the tournament's most valuable player.

"That's real surprising," Nelson said of Call's selection. "It's surprising in the fact that it was a second-place team, but it's not surprising in the way she played. I think she clearly was the dominant player in this tournament."

Call could attribute part of her good showing at the Pepsi/KSU Invitational to the experience she gained playing for the West squad at the United States Olympic Festival held this summer.

Call was in Houston during the last week of July for the event.

She was chosen to play in the Festival because of impressive credentials from last season. Call finished among the top four in every major statistical category on K-State's team last year.

Nelson said a good start would possibly enable K-State to earn a top-20 ranking sometime during the season. He said it is important for a team to start well because winning "snowballs on itself when you win."

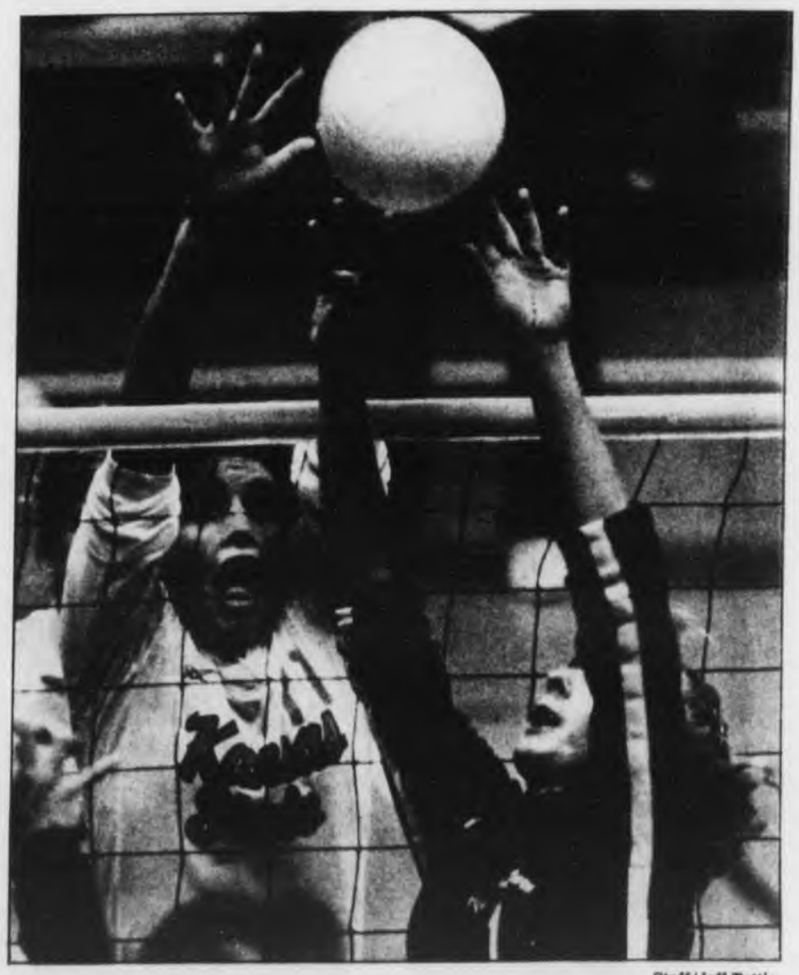
A tough early season schedule, Nelson said, should prepare the Wildcat netters for the rigors of the Big Eight season. Last year, K-State went 21-11 overall and placed third in the conference race.

K-State, after a sluggish start, reached the finals by defeating the Northeast Louisiana Lady Indians 13-15, 15-11, 15-10 and 15-6 Friday night.

K-State, relying heavily on the play of Kinsey and Call in the opener, received a big lift off the bench from freshmen Tami Tibbets and Kristin Martin.

Nelson said the fact that Northeast Louisiana had only seven players suited up for the game was a factor in the outcome.

"It looked like they got a little tired and lost some concentration at the end," said Nelson, who substituted freely throughout the match.



Northwestern had little trouble in the opening-round match against Missouri, disposing of the Tigers 15-2, 15-7 and 15-8. Missouri claimed third place Saturday night with a five-set victory over Northeast Louisiana.

Nelson was happy with his team's overall performance in the tournament.

"I don't mind losing (the tournament)," he said. "I am interested in, as I said going into the tournament, how we progressed, not so much in our win-loss record, but 'Did we improve? Was the competition beneficial for us?' And those answers are real strong 'yeses.'"

In a match not affiliated with the tournament, the Wildcats beat Missouri 15-7, 2-15, 15-13 and 15-4 Saturday afternoon.

K-State, 2-1, will see its next action Friday and Saturday when Drake and Wichita State come to town for the 10th annual KSU Invitational at Ahearn.

KC dumps Cincinnati in opening-day match

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs found the perfect way to begin an NFL season — block a punt for the go-ahead touchdown before your offense even touches the ball.

Buoyed by Deron Cherry's touchdown recovery with 1:42 elapsed, the Chiefs went on Sunday to post a 24-14 victory over the Cincinnati Bengals in the opener for the two teams.

"We scored a touchdown off the special teams at the start of the game and that took the pressure off," said Chiefs' quarterback Todd Blackledge.

Safety Mark Robinson came crashing through to block Jeff Hayes' punt and the ball bounced 15 yards backward into the end zone, where Cherry fell on it.

"We go out there with the idea of giving it our all on every play," Cherry said.

"Our goal is to make one big play on special teams every game. We were able to do it at the start of the game today and fortunately, it set the tone for the game."

"That blocked punt might have been the difference in the ballgame," said Bengals Coach Sam Wyche. "We had a quick snap on as we figured they would blitz. As it was, we were the ones who weren't ready."

The Chiefs, hoping to improve on last year's 6-10 record, were locked in a 7-7 halftime tie after the Bengals Boomer Esiason completed a 15-yard pass into the end zone to Cris Collinsworth, who beat Albert Lewis.

The Chiefs went ahead 21-7 in the third quarter when their sluggish offense produced a pair of touchdowns.

Nick Lowery iced the victory with an 18-yard field goal for the Chiefs with 1:32 left in the game.

Jeff Smith, following a tackle-breaking, 40-yard run by Herman Heard, took a short pass from Blackledge at about the 12-yard line, shook off a tackler at the 5, and put the Chiefs ahead 14-7 with 11:30 left in the third quarter.

About 10 minutes later, tight end Walt Arnold fell on Heard's goalline fumble in the end zone to give Kansas City a 14-point advantage.

Esiason brought the Bengals to within seven points midway through the fourth period with his second touchdown pass to Collinsworth.

Navratilova, Lendl win titles

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Martina Navratilova, the level of her game as high as her emotions, captured her third U.S. Open women's singles title in four years Sunday, crushing Czechoslovakia's Helena Sukova 6-3, 6-2.

It was Navratilova's second straight Grand Slam crown — she won Wimbledon in July — and the 15th Grand Slam singles title.

Navratilova advanced to the finals by defeating Steffi Graf 6-1, 6-7 (3-7), 7-6 (10-8).

Lendl won in straight sets over Miloslav Mercir of Czechoslovakia. Mercir advanced to the finals by upsetting Boris Becker in the semifinals on Saturday.

"Once I won the first set, I started moving and playing so much better," Lendl said.

Mecir had one ace and two double-faults. And he finished with 42 unforced errors, 20 more than Lendl.

Where the first set took 50 minutes to complete, Lendl ran through the final set in just 26 minutes.

Alumni knocks off varsity twice in yearly tournament

By JEFF RAPP
Collegian Reporter

The boisterous alumni team of the K-State Rugby Football Club rolled into town Saturday with two things in mind — to win and to have a great time.

They did both.

The alumni team, referred to as the "old boys," defeated both sides of the current K-State rugby club in Saturday's alumni reunion tournament, held at the practice field adjacent to the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area.

In the first game the alumni took on the less experienced group of K-State rugby players called the "B-side." The alumni won 7-0 with one try (like a touchdown except worth four points) and a penalty kick (worth three points).

The second game matched a group of younger alumni with the nationally ranked "A-side." Because of a lack of younger alumni showing up for the tournament, some substitutes were used from the B-side. The A-side won the contest 6-0.

In the championship game the alumni team, comprised primarily of the 1972 rugby club, huddled enthusiastically on the field. They yelled and sang songs reminiscent of their college days.

Midway through the first half, the alumni took the lead with their first try and converted on the two-point kick to make the score 6-0. There were many scoring opportunities for both squads in the second half but no points were scored, giving the alumni the tourney championship.

"This is reminiscent of how this club used to play," said Bob Hensler, who coached the alumni team Saturday. "They put aside their age and threw their guts out." Hensler, a lieutenant colonel in the U.S. Army, is stationed at Fort Drum, N.Y.

On the field for the A-side were two honorable mention All-American rugby players. One was Gregg Barnes.

"This is a really big weekend for us," Barnes said.

The A-side was not lacking in personality but didn't seem as boisterous as the "old boys."

Bringing their feathered fowl to Fields of Fair, competitors gathered from near and far to see whose chicken could go the farthest while...

FLYING THE COOP

Ken Swanner persuades Chicken Little out of the launching box during the finals of the Eighth Annual Chicken Flying Contest Saturday at Fields of Fair where Swanner's bird soared to first place.

Winning the contest was a bit of surprise for Swanner but he held his chicken and trophy with victorious pride.

The sky didn't fall Saturday, but Chicken Little, nonetheless, was the star of the show.

Chicken Little defeated 31 other chickens to capture first place in the Eighth Annual Chicken Flying Contest at Fields of Fair, located approximately six miles east of Manhattan.

In addition to the chicken flying contest, contestants participated in a variety of events including coed mud volleyball, horseshoes, frog jumping, egg toss, chicken rodeo and watermelon-eating contest. Winners were awarded trophies or T-shirts for the top three places in each event.

"I think it's a great thing they do here," said Gene Christense of Milford. "I bring the wife and family and it's just a fun afternoon."

Christense's chicken, Lance, was in second place after the preliminary round, but failed to place in the finals.

Last year's contest raised $3,800. This year's amount is expected to be less because of the poor weather, said Hannible Hays, chicken fly committee chairman.

Preparation for the event began about two months ago, said Melissa Gehrt, secretary of the chicken fly committee.

"Being the eighth year, things were pretty routine," Gehrt said. "But with the new location, it did take a little extra planning." Previous contests had been held at the Blue River Pub, located near the Tuttle Creek Lake dam.

As for the chickens, little or no preparation goes into getting them ready for the event. Some people bring their own, but most "rent" a chicken from the ones donated.

The chickens are placed in a box on top of a platform and shoved out with a plunger. There are no rules and all of the birds are grouped into a single weight class.

This year's winning contestant, Ken Swanner of Manhattan, relied on a rented chicken. It was the first chicken flying contest for either of them.

"I just came out to have a good time," Swanner said. "And I had a lot of fun."

Eight local unions, Budweiser and KQLA-FM sponsored the contest to raise money for the United Way and Kansas Vietnam Memorial in Junction City.

Hays said all the money given to the United Way will be distributed to local organizations and associated United Way agencies.

University programs help ag communities

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

Although many may not be aware of their existence, several programs to aid the agricultural community are available through the University.

It has been a time of struggling and depression the last few years for the farmers of Kansas, forcing families in rural communities to go through rough times that cause a lot of stress, said John Murray, head of the Department of Human Development and Family Studies.

"It is sad what is happening and the effects in which the children on the farm are going through," he said.

Murray, along with Charles Smith, associate professor of human development and family studies, are concerned with the issue and are taking an interest in helping with the problem.

Smith has developed a video teleconference titled "Heartaches in the Heartland Helping Children Through the Rural Crisis," which is scheduled to be broadcast from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. Dec. 4.

"The topic of the program will be the effects of economic stress on rural children and youth," Smith said. He said the program will concern not only the origins of the rural crisis but also the serious consequences and effects on human beings.

Smith said it is important that people know what is happening to Kansas children as a result of today's farm economy.

Prior to the video teleconference, on Nov. 21-22, K-State will be conducting its Sixth Annual Working with Families Conference in the Union.

The conference's topic will be "Future of Rural Families in the Heartland." The conference will be hosted by the Family Center, which is a part of the College of Human Ecology.

Smith described the program as "a course in helping."

"This program here at K-State is for everyone," he said. "It is not just for students living on the farm but for anyone needing help coping with stress." The program is set up through the Division of Cooperative Extension.

Smith said he understands the importance of a program such as this and hopes it can be helpful to students and others in the area.

Another program being proposed is the formation of the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives.

The program is designed to be a University-wide coordinating organization to enhance K-State's ability to address both problems and opportunities experienced by rural Kansans. The establishment of such a center would have a number of benefits for K-State, Smith said.

First, K-State would serve its primary service by responding to the needs of Kansas citizens.

The second function is that K-State would be contributing to the maintenance and development of rural Kansas while serving both local communities and the University.

The third function is to enhance K-State's image as a concerned institution willing to help with the difficulties in the rural community.

Fourth, the center would support recruitment and retention of students — more than half of whom are from rural communities — through direct involvement and would provide learning opportunities for rural adults.

University to present television courses

By SHERI DIRKS
Collegian Reporter

Students have the opportunity this semester to watch two television programs, "The Africans" and "Focus on Society," for credit at the University.

These two programs are the telecourses being offered this fall by the Division of Continuing Education in conjunction with programming on KTWU, Channel 11, in Topeka.

A television does not replace the instructor, although it is a college course in which television does the lecturing, said Peg Wherry, coordinator for Off-Campus Programs in Continuing Education.

In addition to viewing the broadcasts, students are required to meet periodically in group discussions with the instructor and complete assignments. Discussion dates and times are appointed by the instructor, she said.

"Television can provide exceptionally vivid examples through interviews, case studies and computer models," Wherry said.

She said the University has been involved in television courses for about 10 years, but not until the fall of 1983 has the program been consistent and organized.

Previous telecourses included a series on Vietnam, a computer science course and a course called "Brain, Mind and Behavior."

Average enrollment for the courses is 15 to 18 students, although the course on Vietnam had a higher enrollment, Wherry said.

"We're establishing more consistent enrollment," she said. "It takes a while for people to understand something like this."

In addition to K-State students, high school juniors and seniors and people in Manhattan and the surrounding communities also may enroll in the telecourses, Wherry said.

The course fee is $42 per credit hour for undergraduate students and $60 per credit hour for graduate students, she said. Full-time students may have the tuition waived.

'...if you're watching it (TV) for instruction, you have to really pay more attention than if you're watching reruns of "Gilligan's Island."'

—Peg Wherry

Wherry said all students must pay a $15 fee, which is given to the agency the University licenses the course from.

The costs to K-State for the telecourses vary. She said the two largest fees are the licensing fee, which is similiar to a copyright fee, and an air-time fee.

In Kansas an organization called Kansas Association for Post Secondary Educational Television is granted funds from the Kansas Public Broadcasting Commission, Wherry said.

"Those funds can be used for license and air time for two courses a semester," she said. "Focus on Society" is being funded this semester by KAPSET, Wherry said.

K-State is not required to pay air time for "The Africans" because it is a prime-time program and would be broadcast even if the University did not offer it as a telecourse this fall.

Wherry suggests that students enrolled in a telecourse adopt the same responsibility when viewing the program as when in the classroom.

"Most of us view television as a source of entertainment," she said. "It may be good enough television that you would watch it for entertainment. But if you're watching it for instruction, you have to really pay more attention than if you're watching reruns of 'Gilligan's Island.'"

Henry Camp, associate professor of sociology, is the instructor for the "Focus on Society" telecourse. He said there are about 15 students enrolled in the course.

"They generally tend to be older students living near Manhattanbecause they come on campus four times a semester, but they are gerally within a 60-mile radius of Manhattan," Camp said.

The telecourse program is advantageous to people who have a family and also work, because they don't have a flexible schedule that would allow for on-campus courses, he said.

"I think it's good for the University to try to reach non-traditional students," Camp said. "I think it's well-received by people who just find it very difficult to attend a university or even a junior college."

He said he enjoys teaching the telecourse and encourages the University to continue the program. The "Focus on Society" course airs from 2 to 3 p.m. on Saturdays.

The second telecourse offered is "The Africans. It airs from 8 to 9 p.m. on Tuesdays for nine weeks beginning Oct. 7.

Martin Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, will instruct the course. This is the first telecourse that Ottenheimer has taught, although he previously taught a TELENET course last spring. That course involved videos, reading material and telephone discussions with high school students across Kansas.

Generally, courses with subject matter on Africa have a low enrollment, Ottenheimer said. This is due to the image that the United States has of Africa.

"I would imagine that the contemporary view of most dealings of Africa is that it's become a backwater, if anything," Ottenheimer said.

Ottenheimer has visited Africa four times beginning in 1967, he said. His visits were primarily to eastern Africa, and from his experience he has written a book, "Marriage in Domoni," which he uses in his Introduction to Anthropology course.

Through "The Africans" course, he said he hopes to present the past, the present and the future of Africa and the contribution the continent has made to America.

"There's a different view for those of us who've been there and for those of us who are willing to learn from Africa," Ottenheimer said.

Enrollment for the telecourses may be in person, by telephone or by mail through Continuing Education in Umberger 317. Fees must be paid at the time of enrollment, and late fees will be charged after the second broadcast.

If a student misses a broadcast or would like to review, copies are available in the Audio-Visual/Curriculum Collection on the fifth floor of Farrell Library.

Roth heats up fans with new act

By DERON JOHNSON
Features Editor

Considering he had to perform for concert-goers who were battling unseasonably cold, windy and rainy weather, David Lee Roth did a fine job of pleasing the less-than-capacity crowd at Sandstone Amphitheater Saturday night.

Staff/Brett Hacker

Rock singer David Lee Roth entertains an enthusiastic, but small crowd Saturday at the Sandstone Amphitheater. Despite cold weather and rain during the event, most enjoyed the concert and Roth's antics.

Roth, attired in black and yellow striped tights and various unbuttoned shirts, took the stage at about 9:30 p.m. and immediately assumed his high-energy stage persona complete with his trademark of acrobatics.

His dedicated fans were impressed, but it was impossible to tell if Roth was jumping about for the fans' benefit or simply to keep warm.

Regardless of motive, Roth maintained a high energy level through his 1½-hour set, which included new material from his "Eat 'Em and Smile" LP — his second without Van Halen — and some old Van Halen favorites as well.

Review

Roth opened his show with "Tobacco Road," a cut from his latest effort. He performed the song with surprisingly little improvisation and the result was as if it was straight off the radio. The crowd responded enthusiastically.

But it was with a Van Halen classic — "Panama" — that the crowd opened up with thunderous approval. It also seemed to be the cut that Roth had the most fun with.

That's probably because the song provided Roth with a chance to tease the audience, particularly the females, with a spicy and risque version of the song that lasted nearly five minutes. This song, especially, allowed Roth to live up to his image as one of rock's bad boys.

Although Roth made no attempt to avoid old Van Halen cuts, he did make it clear to the audience that his is a new act. "What do you think of the new band so far?" he asked the audience after the performance of "Tobacco Road." The crowd answered with an obligatory roar of approval.

While Roth made it clear to the crowd that there is life after Van Halen, his fans made it clear to him that many of their favorite songs are still Van Halen's. Because of this, Roth cannot cut his former band's songs from his act. At least not yet.

Roth, however, successfully combined the old and the new.

Technically, the show was disappointing. The light maneuvers were at the most utilitarian level and the main speakers shut down two different times, making Roth sound like he was performing from inside of a tin can.

The opening act, Cinderella, showed some hard-rock promise with a couple infectious songs. However, they basically performed copycat melodies in each of their cuts. Their mostly standard fare was greeted by mostly standard, polite applause from the audience.

Terrorists kill 21 worshipers at Istanbul's main synagogue

By The Associated Press

ISTANBUL, Turkey — Premier Turgut Ozal said Sunday that two terrorists who killed 21 worshipers and wounded four at Istanbul's main synagogue may have been linked to Lebanon, not Libya.

Conflicting claims of responsibility were made on behalf of Palestinian, Shiite Moslem and Arab unity groups, but police could say only that the attackers were Arabs.

After locking the synagogue's main door and firing on the Jewish congregation Saturday with submachine guns, the gunmen killed themselves with hand grenades.

Ozal told reporters Sunday, "It seems this attack doesn't have anything to do with Libya but with Lebanon." He refused to elaborate.

Libya said Sunday that it harbored no hostility against Jews and said it disapproved of attacks on "such innocent people."

The task of identifying gunmen and victims continued Sunday.

Jak Veissid, an adviser to Chief Rabbi David Asseo, told a news conference that police had identified all but three of the victims, including two cantors who were conducting a Sabbath service.

Veissid said a single funeral service for the victims was tentatively set for Wednesday at the synagogue. Officials said all the victims were men and most were elderly. The youngest was 33. All were Turkish except for one Italian and one Iranian.

"We are feeling shock, sorrow and sadness after this situation," Veissid said. "But we (Jews) are a very, very secure community in Turkey. This act will not change anything in our situation."

Ninety-eight percent of Turkey's 48 million people are Moslem, with only 22,000 Jews.

More than 100 people gathered Sunday outside Neve Shalom Synagogue. Inside, dried pools of blood, scraps of human bone and charred skullcaps were on the floor.

McCain board seeks students' help

By The Collegian Staff

The McCain Auditorium Development Board is looking for 11 graduate or undergraduate students to help form the McCain Student Development Council.

The council will work with the McCain Development Board, an organization consisting of Manhattan and Fort Riley residents, and University faculty that help in publicizing events at McCain, said Mary Kay Zabel, chairman of the student committee and assistant professor of administration and foundations.

"McCain Auditorium offers a good program, but students don't realize it's here," Zabel said. "We want more students taking advantage of what McCain has to offer."

The McCain Student Development Council's main purpose would be to talk to the living groups across campus about what McCain has to offer, such as the McCain Series, which hosts the performing arts. In addition, this council would sponsor social events and give tours of the facilities at McCain.

"We're looking for adventurous souls, their advice and thoughts on what would be helpful to McCain," Zabel said.

Zabel said anyone interested in this position doesn't need to have experience in the arts, just an interest in it. Interested persons may pick up applications in McCain 207, Zabel said.

Mall to generate hundreds of jobs

By The Collegian Staff

At first glance, the downtown area may appear to be somewhat of a mess. But the downtown redevelopment project is proceeding smoothly, said Gary Stith, Manhattan community development director.

The main drawing card of the project is the construction of a shopping mall called the Manhattan Town Center. The mall will offer area shoppers between 75 and 90 stores to choose from, Stith said.

Forest City Rental Properties and JCP Realty Inc. are the developers of the mall. The developers estimate that between 75 to 80 percent of the stores will be filled upon the mall's opening, Stith said.

After tending to a few surveying details, construction of the mall's foundation should begin by mid-September, Stith said. He said completion of the mall is about one year away.

Stith said there have been no real problems in the final preparation before building the mall's foundation. However, there were just enough rainy days in August to delay foundation construction a week or two, he said.

The general contractor for the construction of the mall is the Law Company of Wichita. It is up to the general contractor to subcontract such work as the electrical, roofing and plumbing work entailed in the mall's construction, he said.

Streetscaping is underway in the downtown area, Stith said. As part of the downtown redevelopment project, the proposed streetscaping design includes landscaping, new sidewalks, drinking fountains, trash receptacles, bicycle racks and benches.

The Manhattan Community Development Department estimates that 644 temporary construction jobs and 774 permanent jobs will be created as a result of the building of the mall.

whether Reagan has received a response to his written message to Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev appealing for Daniloff's release.

"I think the president is determined to see a successful resolution of the matter," said Speakes. "He regards it as serious ... He is concerned."

"Daniloff is innocent," Speakes told reporters earlier Sunday in Santa Barbara, Calif., where Reagan was vacationing. He reiterated that "there will be no trade" of any accused Soviet spy for Daniloff.

U.S. officials in Washington have said the Reagan administration proposed that Daniloff be freed in exchange for releasing Zakharov into the Soviet ambassador's custody pending his trial. However, U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz on Friday ruled out an outright swap.

Local merchants propose funding scholarship drive

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

By making $3 million in scholarship monies available to first-time K-State students, local businesses are hoping to have a positive effect on the University's enrollment.

The Greater Manhattan Scholarship Program is attempting to raise 1,000 scholarships of $1,000 each every year for the next three years, said Jerry Mills, project coordinator.

Mills, owner of Regency Realty, 2312 Anderson Ave., said he came up with the idea because Manhattan's economy depends largely on K-State's enrollment.

"Money talks," he said. "That's the whole idea behind the scholarships."

The economic impact the decline in enrollment has on Manhattan businesses is "terrific," Mills said.

Estimating enrollment figures to be down about 3,000 since 1982, Mills said if each of those 3,000 had spent $5,000 a year on living expenses in Manhattan, and each dollar had turned over six times in the community, a negative impact of nearly $100 million resulted each year.

The decrease in the number of students also results in a decrease in the number of faculty and administration members, which further affects the economy, he said.

University President Jon Wefald is advising on the project, Mills said.

"One of his (Wefald's) prime priorities now is to get the trend in enrollment turned around," Mills said.

The project, which began in mid-July, is based on a pyramid system. A group called the Original 10 was formed, each with the responsibility of getting 10 other businesses

Essay collection recalls Eisenhower presidency

By LISA CARLIN
Collegian Reporter

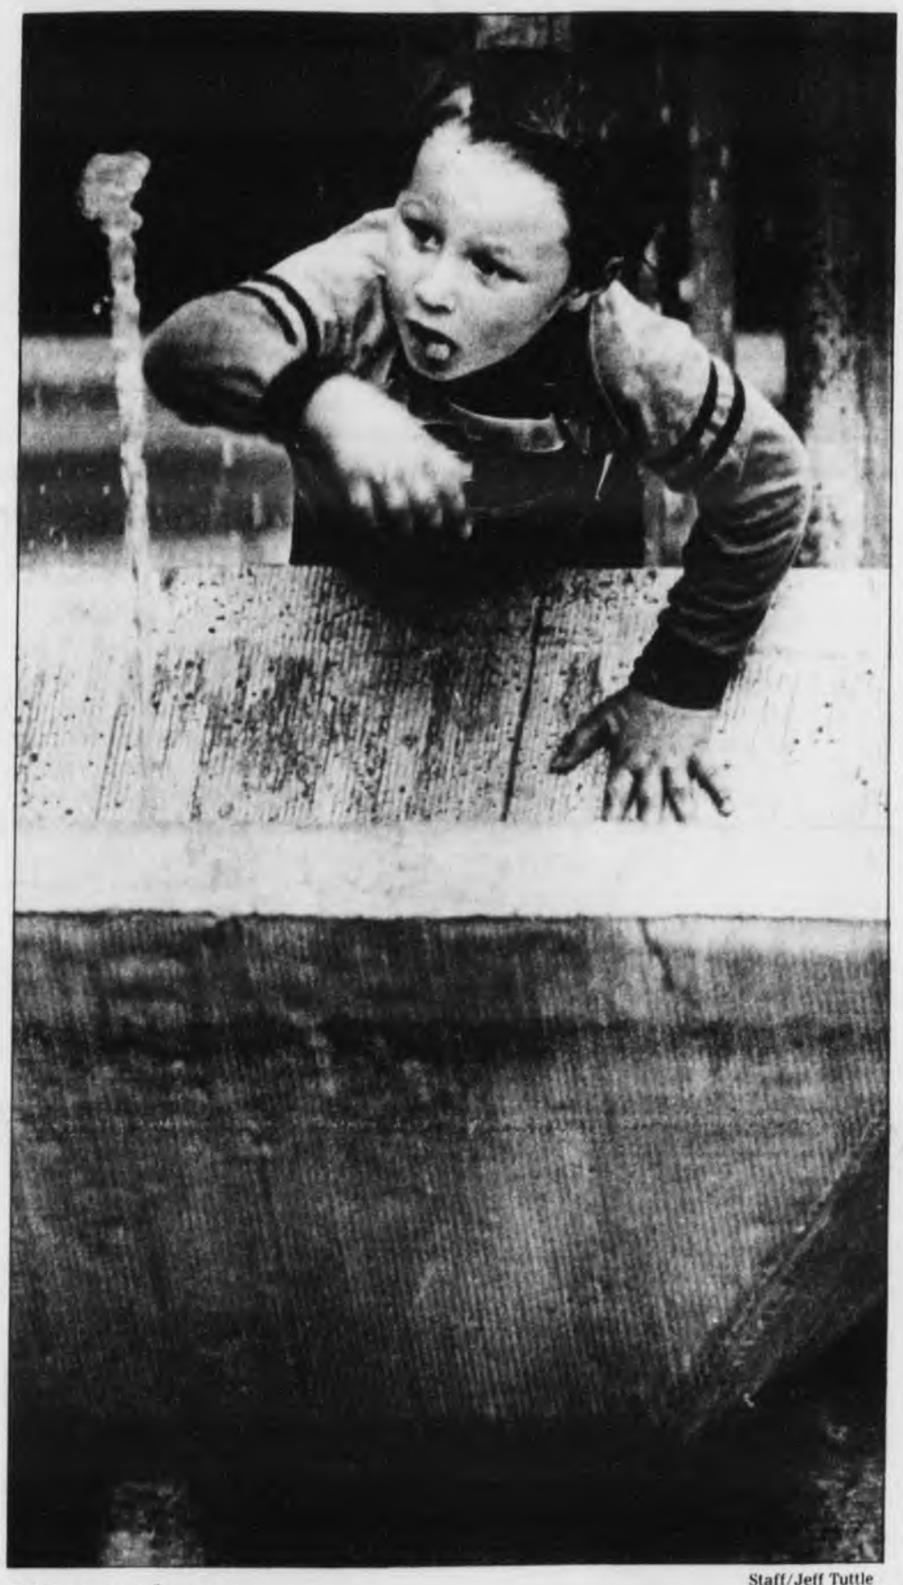
Milton S. Eisenhower, the man who led K-State's development from a land-grant institution to a major state university, is the subject of a new book of essays.

"The Milton S. Eisenhower Years at Kansas State University" contains nine essays separately authored. Each of the authors tells personal experiences with Eisenhower during the time of his presidency from 1943 to 1950.

Virgina Quiring, associate dean of libraries and editor of the book, said the essays show numerous sides of Eisenhower's personality.

Author Chester Peters, vice president emeritus for student affairs, described Eisenhower as a "leader in world affairs at the same time that he was leading Kansas State in new directions."

Max Milbourn, director of public service at the University in 1949 and past assistant to the president, portrayed him as a mentor and a friend.



The book also contains an introduction by Duane Acker, former University president, who cited conversations with Eisenhower as one of his "greatest treasures in academic administration."

In his introduction, Acker said Eisenhower's words and thoughts "continue to challenge this university to remain a living part of society."

As an example, he mentioned Eisenhower's challenge to students at a commencement address: "Be prepared to cope with change, to deal with problems that have no precedent and to live under a tidal wave of swift-moving and bewildering events."

Other essay authors are James A. McCain, University president following Eisenhower; Earle Davis, professor emeritus of English;

Police raid opposition in Santiago

By The Associated Press

SANTIAGO — Security forces on Monday arrested opposition leaders and raided leftist strongholds in slum areas to search for the would-be assassins who ambushed President Augusto Pinochet's motorcade.

Three leading dissidents and three French activist priests were among those said to have been arrested. Five news magazines were banned.

"The government has enough support to do whatever it wants," declared Pinochet, his hand bandaged, as he arrived for work and waved to scores of applauding supporters outside the presidential palace.

The ruling four-man junta, dominated by Pinochet, decreed a 90-day siege throughout Chile after Sunday's rocket and machine gun attack. Five of Pinochet's bodyguards were killed and 11 wounded in the ambush.

Pinochet, a general and the commander of the army, suffered only cuts on his left hand in the ambush on a road in the Maipo Canyon, 18 miles southeast of the capital. He was returning from his weekend home.

It was the first reported attempt on Pinochet's life since he took power in a military coup 13 years ago Thursday.

Neither of the country's two Marxist guerrilla groups claimed responsibility for the attack.

Chile's Roman Catholic bishops and the broad-based moderate opposition movement condemned the assassination attempt.

Soldiers with blackened faces and several tanks surrounded La Victoria and Davila slums before dawn and security police began house-to-house searches, witnesses said. Both shantytowns in southwestern Santiago have strong Marxist political organizations.

Three French Roman Catholic priests were arrested during the raids, a church spokeswoman told the Associated Press. Speaking on condition of anonymity, she said the priests, Paul Dubois, Daniel Caruette and Jaime Lancelot, were taken to a nearby police station.

The state of siege permits the government to tap telephones, open mail and hold prisoners indefinitely without notifying their relatives. It suspends judicial review of the government's power to arrest and banish dissidents, ban public gatherings and censor the press.

Pinochet declined to say what specific restrictions would be applied.

Gorbachev still in favor of Soviet-American arms summit

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Kremlin leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev said Monday that he still wants another superpower summit and that a foreign ministers' meeting scheduled this month will show "whether the Soviet-American dialogue has a chance to advance farther."

Since the summit in Geneva, Gorbachev said, the two nations "have not moved even an inch closer to an arms reduction agreement."

Gorbachev's comments were made in reply to questions from the Czechoslovak newspaper Rude Pravo. They were distributed by the Soviet news agency Tass and read over national television.

Commenting on the possibility of a new summit with President Reagan, Gorbachev said, "We are for holding a Soviet-American summit, a summit that would be marked by notable headway in solving if only one or two of the substantial problems of international security."

Gorbachev said he does not take an "all or nothing" attitude toward a second meeting with Reagan, but added: "There is no sense in holding a meeting for the sake of 'nothing.'"

At their first meeting in Geneva, Reagan and Gorbachev agreed to meet again in the United States this year and in the Soviet Union next year.

But the Kremlin has delayed setting a date for the 1986 meeting, saying it wants assurance of concrete progress in arms control first.

Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze are scheduled to meet in Washington Sept. 19-20 to talk about the new summit.

They were supposed to have met in May, but the Soviets canceled the meeting after the U.S. bombing of Libya in April.

The Soviet arrest of American correspondent Nicholas Daniloff on espionage charges has prompted speculation that it could endanger a summit this year.

Gorbachev blamed the United States for the lack of progress in arms control.

"If one proceeds from the view that a moratorium is unacceptable, if the question of medium-range missiles in Europe is blocked, if strategic arms are to be upgraded, and so on, then what is there to agree about," Gorbachev said.

Nuclear winter theory shows effects

By LISA SHEIKH
Collegian Reporter

Imagine a frozen world with no light and no green plants, where basic survival is a daily uncertainty. This is how scientists think the world would be after a nuclear war.

"My generation grew up scared to death of nuclear bombs. To me, it is inconceivable that anyone could talk calmly about nuclear winter and what happens afterward," said James C. Legg, professor of physics.

"I think that maybe the nuclear winter concept is for your generation what the radioactivity, etc., is for my generation," he said.

Legg's viewpoint concerning nuclear winter is a relatively young theory, the precise implications of which are as yet uncertain.

While no one knows for certain the extent to which the aftereffects of a nuclear war would damage life on Earth, current models do indeed suggest a grim picture of "the day after" theory.

Since 1982, when the nuclear winter theory had its birth, scientists have been constructing computer models on the atmosphere in an effort to predict what would happen.

"Most of the people who have run the computer models have come up with pretty severe effects — months to years of darkness," Legg said.

The history of nuclear winter originates in a theory about why the dinosaurs died. In 1981, scientists, through investigation of the soil and fossils, conceived of the possibility that a large meteor strike could have thrown enough dust and debris into the atmosphere to block out the sun, freezing the dinosaurs into extinction, he said.

Besides this theory, there is, "some very small historical evidence," Legg said. He said one of the cases always cited is the East Indies volcano, Tambora, of 1815. In July of that year, New England had snow, and all of the United States experienced surprisingly low temperatures. This phenomenon is believed to have been the result of ashes from the volcano blowing around in the atmosphere, blocking out the sunlight.

Although this extreme temperature change occurred at a local level, Legg said, "The nuclear winter theory says simply that if you have massive strikes, you've got lots of dirt going up."

If the dirt alone would not be enough to block the sun, smoke and soot from burning cities added to the dirt would. Thus, the Discussion to precede convocation

By The Collegian Staff

A pre-convocation forum on the atmospheric effects of a nuclear war will be at 7:30 tonight in the Farrell Library Browsing Room.

Panelists discussing the nuclear winter issue will be Dean Bark, professor of physics; Ted Barkley, professor of biology; Pat O'Brien, professor of anthropology; and Alden Williams, professor of political science.

The panelists will explain terminology and aspects involved in nuclear winter to prepare students for Thursday's convocation lecture, "Atmospheric Effects of a Major Nuclear Exchange," Bark said.

George Carrier, chairman of the National Acacemy of Science study group on nuclear winter, and professor of applied mathematics at Harvard University, will deliver the first Convocation series lecture of the fall term at 1:30 p.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

Judge initiates selection for jury in Mafia trial

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Brushing aside defense complaints of ill health, double jeopardy and pretrial publicity, a federal judge began picking an anonymous jury Monday for the trial of eight men accused of participating in the Mafia's ruling commission.

Among the questions potential jurors were asked was whether they had ever heard of Al Capone, the notorious Chicago mob boss.

Mafia history is at the heart of the case as the government tries to prove that from the 1930s until recent months, leaders of the five mob families based in New York met periodically as a "commission" to divide territories, share the spoils of criminal operations and, sometimes, authorize a murder.

The commission's influence extended well beyond New York, sometimes to the point of choosing leaders for families in distant cities, the government contends.

Three reputed mob bosses — Carmine Persico of the Colombo family, Anthony "Tony Ducks" Corallo of the Lucchese family and Anthony "Fat Tony" Salerno of the Genovese family — were in the courtroom, along with five of their alleged associates, as U.S. District Judge Richard Owen summoned 100 prospective jurors.

Questionnaires were handed out asking each of the potential jurors if they "know or have heard of" any of some 200 past and present Mafia figures or alleged mob members, including such leaders from past decades as Capone, Albert Anastasia, Carlo Gambino and Joseph Profaci.

A "yes" answer would not necessarily disqualify a would-be juror, but would lead to more intense questioning by the judge about the individual's knowledge and feelings about the Mafia.

Pakistani government frees Bhutto

KARACHI, Pakistan — Authorities on Monday freed opposition leader Benazir Bhutto, 25 days after she was jailed in a crackdown against foes of the government of President Mohammad Zia ul-Haq.

An Associated Press reporter saw Bhutto return to her Karachi home after being released from Landhi jail. On Tuesday, a hearing was scheduled before the Sind provincial high court on her appeal of the government's 30-day detention order.

The 33-year-old leader of the Pakistan Peoples Party was arrested in Karachi on Aug. 14 after addressing a public rally despite a government ban on political activity.

Hundreds of opposition leaders were arrested nationwide Aug. 13 and Aug. 14. The arrests led to violent unrest in which at least 29 people were killed.

KCC cuts utility's rate-hike request

TOPEKA — The staff of the Kansas Corporation Commission has recommended that Union Gas System Inc. be granted only 38 percent of a $2.35 million rate increase it requested last February and amended in August.

In testimony prefiled Monday for the technical hearings on the rate application, which will be held Sept. 29-Oct. 1, the KCC staff proposed the utility, which has its headquarters in Independence, be allowed to raise its rates by only $883,895, or 2.1 percent.

The staff recommendation is not binding on the commission, which will decide after the hearings how much of the increase to grant.

The KCC has public hearings scheduled at 7 p.m. Tuesday in the Johnson County Courthouse in Olathe and at 7 p.m. Wednesday in the Independence City Commission chambers on the rate increase. The technical hearings will follow in three weeks in Topeka.

NATIONAL

Economic gains benefit Northeast

WASHINGTON — The New England states have reaped the biggest rewards from the current economic expansion, while residents of the energy-producing states have lagged far behind the national average in income gains, the government reported Monday.

The Commerce Department said New Hampshire residents have enjoyed a 30.6 percent income gain since the last recession ended in 1982, the biggest increase of any state.

Nationwide, Americans' personal income has climbed 20.9 percent since 1982 to an average of $13,867 for every person in the country last year. Consumer prices during this same period were rising 11.9 percent. This means that the average American's income, after adjusting for inflation, increased 9 percent from 1982 through 1985.

Teacher strikes in 8 states continue

A Rhode Island judge agreed Monday to hear a request to order one town's striking teachers back to work as more than 6,100 teachers remained on strike Monday in seven states, affecting 99,489 students.

Public school teachers were on strike in Pennsylvania, Michigan, Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Washington state and Massachusetts.

In Massachusetts, where public employee strikes are prohibited by state law, a judge began hearing a contempt of court citation against striking Attleboro teachers who defied his back-to-work order last week.

A Michigan judge also agreed Monday to hear arguments Tuesday on Port Huron's request for a back-to-work order.

A tentative settlement was reached Monday in Pennsylvania's Antietam District, but 10 other districts remained on strike with 2,985 teachers and 45,414 pupils.

Another tentative settlement was reached early in Illinois' Okawville District after a 13-day walkout, but teachers remained on strike in three other districts. No details on the proposed contract were released.

5 Reasons Why America Must Bring God Back Into Public Education
1. In the guise of "not teaching religion," the door has merely been opened to regularly indoctrinate todays youth in the principles of a different religion: secular humanism.
2. Evolutionary theory, normally presented as indisputable fact, helps lead many young men and women to the conclusion that their chance existence on this earth has no real meaning or purpose.
3. Unwed pregnancies are actually being promoted, both by undermining the God-given authority that a father and mother have over their children, and by presenting the biological facts of reproduction with no reference to God's moral framework for sex.
4. Having rejected God's standards of character and virtue, certain immoral or godless men and women have been allowed to take positions of great responsibility and authority in the education of America's youth.
5. Without a fear of the Lord in the classroom, today's students must be content to learn mere facts and information, since the ultimate source of true wisdom and understanding is God Himself.

Explosion kills one, injures 19 in Paris city hall post office

By The Associated Press

PARIS — A bomb exploded Monday in a post office on the ground floor of Paris' ornate 17th-century city hall, killing a woman and injuring 19 other people.

The bomb blew out the windows and window frames on one side of the building and devastated the interior of the post office. It came four days after a bomb failed to explode on a crowded commuter train in central Paris.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the latest attack, which occurred about 7 p.m.

Paris police chief Jean Paolini said the bomb at city hall had been placed "on or under a bench in the post office."

One witness said he saw two men leave the area just before the explosion. "I saw two Arab-type men flee the post office just before the explosion," he said. "One of them was about 35 and wore a mustache."

The fire department placed the casualty toll at one dead and 19 injured, one of them seriously. A witness said the woman who died was "completely blown apart."

The plaza in front of city hall was littered with glass shards and wood splinters. Inside, panels from the post office's ceiling were hanging down, criss-crossed with ripped out wiring. Furniture was smashed, wood was burned, and the carpeting was ripped to shreds.

Premier Jacques Chirac, who also is mayor of Paris and maintains an office in the building, ironically was forced to interrupt a meeting of his internal security council at the premier's office to go to the scene.

In a statement later, Chirac called for a war against terrorism, "this leprosy of modern times."

He called on the public to help police by reporting suspicious conduct or objects.

The premier said the government would use all means at its disposal to fight terrorism.

In a message to Chirac, President Francois Mitterrand expressed his sympathy to the families of the victims and said, "We must all witness the resolution of the country in combatting without mercy the terrorism that threatens our lives and our liberties."

Last Thursday a bomb placed aboard a commuter train during rush hour failed to detonate.

A group calling itself the Committee for Solidarity with Arab Political Prisoners and the Middle East claimed responsibility for that attempt and said more attacks would follow unless its demands were me

125th birthday state fair's theme

By LYNETTE HAMILTON
Collegian Reporter

Kansas State Fair officials are relying on, among other things, a birthday party and a life-size 1,000-pound cow made of butter, to boost attendance at this year's annual fair. The fair is held in Hutchinson and is continuing daily through this weekend.

The event, which attracted nearly 300,000 visitors last year, is using the state's 125th birthday as its theme. After all the gate receipts are counted, fair officials anticipate a higher attendance figure this year.

Those who attend the annual fair this year will notice several changes. Improvements include grandstand renovations, building alterations and more pavement in the midway area.

Grandstand entertainment will include The Statler Brothers on Thursday; Tammy Wynette and Michael Martin Murphey on Friday; Red Skelton on Saturday; and "The Golden Boys of Bandstand" on Sunday.

Highlights of the fair will be Saturday's appearances by astronauts Col. Joe Engle, Steven Hawley and Capt. Ron Evans, who will be special guests of Gov. John Carlin and the Kansas Commission. Engle and Hawley are active with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. Evans is retired.

K-State's John Riley, assistant director of resident instruction, worked a shift at the Kansas State Agriculture information booth last weekend. He said much of his time was spent answering questions about K-State.

the State Fair

"People are definitely interested in K-State's programs, and we try to respond to all their questions, even when they're not directed toward the ag department," Riley said. His pocket was filled with questions he planned to bring back to K-State and distribute to the various departments.

"The most fascinating part of all this is when someone walks up and says they have a son, daughter or grandchild at K§State," Riley said, "(and they say) 'But you probably don't know them,' and they usually are an advisee or student of mine. Those people really respond when I do know them."

Tim Pottorff, junior in industrial engineering, was faced with the task of organizing and distributing 4-H results all over the state.

"I have to sort these 4-H exhibit result sheets in 105 piles and mail them back to the counties," he said last weekend. Each sheet contains the participant's name, county, class and placing.

"We are here to promote the College of Agriculture and K-State to prospective students and parents," said Roger McClellan, junior in agricultural economics and vice president of Ag Council. McClellan worked at the Kansas State Agriculture booth.

The Collegiate 4-H Club, which has some members who competed on their county livestock and home economic judging teams, ran a concession stand during the first two days of the fair.

Kay Stadel, freshman in animal sciences and industry and the Kansas Pork Queen, was at the fair promoting the pork industry. Vicki Fernkopf, junior in animal sciences and industry and Miss Agriculture, will be promoting the College of Agriculture sometime this week at the fair.

Carlin hails delegation from China

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin welcomed to Topeka Monday an eight-member trade delegation from Henan Province, Kansas' sister state in the People's Republic of China.

The delegation, headed by Henan's vice governor, Hu Tiyun, will spend this week in Kansas, traveling to Wichita, Lawrence, Manhattan, Garden City, Liberal, Hutchinson and Overland Park before returning to China next week.

It will visit the State Fair in Hutchinson Saturday. Henan Province has an exhibit at the fair.

Hu, Carlin and his top aides engaged in formal sister state discussions following the greetings in Carlin's office, while three mayors of cities in southern Henan Province who accompanied Hu toured Topeka.

The delegation remains in Topeka tonight, then goes to Overland Park Tuesday to visit the Catalog Show at the Regency Park Conference Center.

"I hope you got plenty of rest (Sunday night after their arrival), because we have a long agenda for you," Carlin told the Chinese as he welcomed them to Kansas and served them coffee and breakfast rolls.

The governor introduced nine members of his cabinet, all secretaries who head state departments, to the Chinese.

Hu presented Carlin a letter from Henan Gov. He Zhukang, who visited Kansas two years ago.

Gov. He praised Carlin for his efforts in fostering the sister state relationship between Henan and Kansas, and congratulated Kansas on its 125th anniversary of statehood this year.

"I would like to congratulate you and send our best to the people of Kansas," He said in a letter read to the governor by an interpreter who is accompanying the Chinese.

"I the last five years, Gov. Carlin has done a lot of work to promote the relationship between the two states. For this I would like to express my sincere appreciation."

He said Carlin's work has laid a solid foundation for positive future relations between Kansas and Henan Province.

Bennett brings ideas to education branch

The prestige of the Landon Lecture Series on Public Affairs should receive a boost when Secretary of Education William J. Bennett addresses the University today with what should be an enjoyable speech.

In his year and a half as President Reagan's education secretary, Bennett has brought fresh meaning to the role of education chiefs. Realizing the financing and administration of schools is almost entirely up to state and local officials, he has made the U.S. Department of Education a useful resource for ideas viewed as progressive by superintendents, teachers, unions and students alike.

His ideas include more equitable opportunities for education of lower- and middle-income families and minorities. He is soon to propose solutions to school drug problems and is working to improve teachers' standards and raise pay for those who perform well in the classroom.

This strategy has sprouted from his belief that when it comes to education, "we're not getting enough bang for our buck." This presents us with an attitude quite different from traditional cabinet chiefs who usually just want more bucks.

His associates and those who have heard Bennett lecture describe him as a modest, mellow-humored person who represents the untraditional politician in Washington, D.C.

As a new cabinet member, Bennett's ideas and unbashful ability to speak for them made him, as syndicated columnist David S. Broder stated, a strong contender "for the James Watt of the second Reagan Cabinet." Last week, however, Broder wrote, "I have seen a lot of Mr. Bennett lately....and want to update the report and set the record straight. The man has settled down to talking seriously and sensibly about education issues and is beginning to make a significant contribution to the cause of better schools."

United Nations needs contributions of U.S.

Members of Congress will soon vote on a bill that, if passed, would cut in half the U.S. contribution to the United Nations' annual budget.

The bill, sponsored in the House by Rep. Gerald Solomon, R-New York, and in the Senate by our own Republican Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, would reduce U.S. contributions from about 40 percent to 20-25 percent, unless the United States is given a larger say in the U.N. budget process.

Critics of the bill claim it represents another step in the Reagan Administration's process of distancing the United States from the United Nations. During the administration's tenure, the United States has withdrawn from UNESCO on grounds that it has become overpoliticized, has unilaterally opposed the World Health Organization's efforts to improve the use of instant milk formula and has reneged on its pledge to increase funding for the International Development Association.

The administration has threatened to withdraw from the U.N. Conference on Trade and Development. It also ended its adherence to the general compulsory jurisdiction of the United Nations International Court of Justice when the World Court decided to hear Nicaragua's case against the CIA mining of Nicaraguan harbors.

One U.N. official said, "The fundamental problem is that not many people in this administration accept the idea of a U.N. that reflects the diversity of the world. They tend to feel that the U.N. is successful not when it does that, but when it passes resolutions that are consistent with U.S. policy.

Despite claims that the United Nations is guilty of frivolous spending, it continues to provide an invaluable forum for discussion and negotiation among its members. To hamper its services for the sake of questionable short-term political aims would be tragic.

Chilean leader's actions under fire

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

It has been a bad year for U.S.-sponsored dictators. Jean-Claude Duvalier of Haiti and Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines fled their respective countries courtesy of the U.S. Air Force. It seems people are tired of American domination. But the real question is which one will fall next?

A likely candidate for the honor of being the next dictator to blow town on a cargo plane is Gen. Augusto Pinochet of Chile. He has been in the news lately, after his troops torched a U.S. citizen. Now the Reagan administration is scolding him for his mistake. Not the mistake of killing a 19-year-old man but the mistake of killing a 19-year-old American man, which drew the attention of the American public to the reality of Chile under Pinochet.

The United States turned a blind eye to the events in Chile until this incident. Pinochet has killed thousands of people in his 13 years in power. The reason for his obscurity is he is doing what our government put him in office to do. He is making the way clear for American business at the expense of the Chilean people. To make this more clear, we must look into the history of this South American nation.

Chile had a fine democratic tradition before 1973. Elections were conducted regularly and governments entered and left power smoothly. Its constitution prohibited consecutive presidential terms, unlike its counterparts in Haiti and the Philippines. Chile was a symbol of democracy and political stability in a region plagued by military coups and revolts. But this image was soon to change.

Salvador Allende, after consistently good showings in two previous elections, became president in 1970. This was a landmark event in Latin American politics. Allende's Popular Unity party was a coalition of Socialist and Communist groups. It was the first time a Communist government had been elected to power.

The 1970 election was not easy. Allende had to fight money and power of rich landowners and businessmen who would do anything to keep him out of government. While the people would gain from his election, the wealthy elite stood to lose power and influence they had enjoyed for a century.

Allende also had to contend with the CIA in his fight for power. The CIA had already cost him one election, when they paid for half of his opponent's campaign in 1964. The CIA intensified its efforts against Allende to no avail. Even after the election, a U.S.-supported military plot failed to block him taking office. Out of the dust, Allende ascended to the presidency.

Allende started making radical changes in the government. He set out to help peasants by giving them land. These land reform measures were so popular peasants started taking over land faster than the government could keep up with them. He also started nationalizing businesses and again, the demand was so great workers would strike until the government officially took over. He also froze prices and raised workers' wages. The reform took off like a rocket.

Although Allende's policies pleased the poor majority, a few were not so happy. Rich elites were losing power and money they had exploited for years. Workers now had a say in the economic system. The wealthy had to either raise wages or be taken over all together. Even though these people were a minority, they still managed to retain a lot of power.

The United States also was not happy with Chile's economic reform. The copper mines, Chile's largest industry, were owned by the United States. Foreign-owned companies were first on the list to be nationalized. These mines meant big profits for this poor nation and reduced the influence American business had on the economy, so the United States started its secret war against Chile.

The Nixon administration imposed an "invisible blockade" on Chile. They cut off access to loans from the World Bank and other international lending institutions. They also imposed other sanctions to foil the Socialist economic reforms. These sanctions, which had a disastrous effect on the Chilean economy, are much the same policy President Reagan refuses to put on South Africa.

The CIA also stepped up efforts to depose Allende. They gave money and support to many opposition groups, including pro-Nazi factions. They also worked with the military to force Allende out of office. With the promise of money and power, the military turned against Allende.

On Sept. 11, 1973, with the economy in shambles, fighter planes and ground troops attacked the presidential palace and Allende was killed. Pinochet took charge. He rounded up supporters of Allende and executed them or threw them into concentration camps. Many people were expelled from the country, including the mother of the 19-year-old man who was burned to death. Democracy yields to dictatorship, courtesy of the American government.

The questions for us to ask are, why does our government attack free democracies in the name of freedom and democracy? Why do we put dictatorships in their place? Why do we continue to support dictators like Pinochet of Chile and Gen. Zia of Pakistan? Do countries like Chile have the right to pick any government they choose or do we control them like colonial possessions? When you find the answers to these questions, you will see the hypocrisy of our foreign policy. We don't care about democracy, only money.

Sanctions may cause dire outcome

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

Before this country jumps on the bandwagon of full sanctions against South Africa, it better take the age-old advice of "look before you leap."

There's no question about South Africa's racial policy being repulsive. However, countries supporting sanctions must realize there is more than blacks, whites and apartheid to that nation. Its strategic importance and influence on the world balance of power must also be taken into consideration.

South Africa probably has the richest supply of strategic minerals in the world. Five of these minerals crucial for military and industrial purposes are mostly imported to the United States from South Africa. The minerals — chromium, cobalt, manganese, platinum and vanadium — are only abundant in one other nation — the Soviet Union. Full sanctions ending all trade between the United States and South Africa would mean an end to the United States' supply of these strategic resources.

Other strategic minerals such as titanium, necessary for the production of high performance military aircraft, are abundant in the United States and other Western allies, but not in the Soviet Union. Because South Africa has a large supply of this and other strategic natural resources, it becomes the pivotal point for the world balance of power.

Proponents of U.S. sanctions claim their method of action would force South African President P.W. Botha to either change his ways or collapse to a black-controlled government friendly to the United States, thus protecting our strategic supplies.

My question is: Who is going to be this new black-controlled government? Some say Archbishop Desmond Tutu. But it is highly unlikely he could keep the black tribes from fighting each other. In addition, he presents the possibility of adding religious problems to a troubled nation.

Others say the African National Congress will be the next government. However, after the ANC sent a delegation to the the Soviet Party Congress in March, it became painfully obvious their concerns are not those of their fellow countrymen, but instead the interests of the Soviet Union.

This fact becomes more apparent when the ANC conducts "necklacings" of non-revolutionary blacks. When a person is necklaced, his or her hands are chopped off and a gasoline-filled tire is put around his or her neck and ignited. After about 20 minutes of intense pain, the victim finally dies. Winnie Mandela, wife of jailed ANC leader Nelson Mandela, endorsed this terrorist action by proclaiming, "Together, hand in hand, with our boxes of matches and necklaces, we shall liberate this country." Approximately 200 blacks have died at the hands of the ANC and its necklaces this year.

The fact is there is no good choice for leadership of South Africa at this time. Therefore, we must choose the route of stability.

Supporters of sanctions claim that working with the current government in South Africa is putting U.S. economic and strategic interests before the human rights abuses taking place there. What they fail to see is if sanctions let the ANC or other Soviet-backed groups take control of that nation, the last thing on their minds would be human rights. Chances are good that human rights abuses would actually increase, while U.S. economic and strategic interests would be destroyed, and the Soviet Union would have access to valuable natural resources giving it a decisive military advantage over the United States.

Maintaining stability with the Botha government does not mean we have to accept apartheid. Through "constructive engagement," President Reagan's strategy, we can promote progress and opposition toward South Africa's racial discrimination without the disruptions of full sanctions. The method most capable of producing a solution includes the adoption of the Sullivan Principles — a code of conduct for doing business in South Africa.

Developed by Philadelphia minister Leon Sullivan, the principles would require American businesses in South Africa to exercise racial equality on the job, to engage in "corporate civil disobedience" by refusing to fill out South African government documents that control the movement of blacks and to provide legal support to employees who challenge laws on racial segregation at beaches, theaters, schools and other public facilities. Any company failing to adopt these principles would be forced to divest from South Africa.

The Rev. Sullivan's plan, if adopted, would call for an economic boycott if apartheid is not outlawed within a year.

Recent concern about South Africa is unfair to oppressed people in other parts of the world. Liberal Democrats in Congress, such as Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden, make such an issue out of apartheid, while ignoring the current oppressions in Afghanistan, Poland and most everywhere else, that it makes one wonder what their motives really are. The logical conclusion is that their concern is getting media attention so they can move into the White House in 1988, and they couldn't care less about the situation in South Africa and the consequences sanctions would bring.

It's time for Congress to quit politicking about South Africa and start doing something constructive about apartheid.

Rehnquist poor choice

Editor,

Re: Joshura Davis' letter "Cartoon in bad taste" and Mike Riley's column "Rehnquist's integrity stands strong" in Friday's Collegian.

I'd like to respond to the editorials written by Joshura Davis and Mike Riley on the subject of Supreme Court Justice William Rehnquist and the cartoon presented Wednesday's Collegian.

First of all I'm black, I saw the cartoon, and I really don't see what all the fuss is about. Joshura, have you ever seen Larson's strip "The Far Side?" That has the funniest looking white people I've ever seen!

If you were really offended by the cartoon, then I think you're "seeing the tree and missing the forest." The issue of "comic image" is nowhere as important in light of what the cartoon's main point is. The nomination of Supreme Court Justice William Rehnquist for chief justice is a greater threat to minorities and civil rights than any cartoon!

Mike Riley's column praised this man and his position but like Rehnquist's supporters, you neglected to mention the negative aspects of his record, publicly known facts such as these:

— As a lawyer in Arizona, Rehnquist opposed desegrating public housing and schools.

— While serving on the Supreme Court for the past 15 years, he has consistently voted against federal civil rights statutes in 82 out of 83 cases involving minorities, women, the elderly and the disabled.

— In a 1985 interview with the New York Times, he clearly still supports the "separate but equal" doctrine.

— He is also the only justice to support the Reagan administration's view that private schools with segregationist policies should receive tax-exempt status.

To these and other facts brought up by his opponents including the fact that he has an anti-Semitic clause in the deed of sale for one of his homes, Rehnquist replied, "I have no recollections..."

While I do agree with Riley when he says an "elephant's memory" is not a qualification for the job, I do seriously worry about a judiciary who doesn't read his own legal documents!

The Rehnquist nomination was also formally opposed by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights (an organization made up of more than 185 groups) and yet you praise this man's "integrity?"

What makes me angry is conservatives like yourself love to switch tactics with only certain people. With Vanessa Williams, it was her pictorial acrobatics; with Geraldine Ferraro, it was her husband's taxes; but with Rehnquist, you want to try the "he's-such-a-nice-guy" spiel. Give me a break!

If you take a harder look at the man and his record you'll find that Rehnquist is to civil rights what James Watt was to Yellowstone National Park. As a black man and opposer of the nomination, I urge Riley and others like him to wake up and smell the toast.

It's not comic strips and negative images that are putting this country's civil rights in the toilet; it's the legislative racism and prejudice of men like Rehnquist.

Cooperative needs aid

Editor,

Re: Glynda W. Lucas' letter "Co-op uncooperative" in Thursday's Collegian.

As a member of the board of the KSU Child Care Cooperative responsible for the painful decisions of Aug. 15, I feel compelled to respond to Lucas' letter.

What I wish to address is this: The decisions to "tighten" our flexicare policies and revise our sliding fee schedule affected everyone in the cooperative. What is important to understand is that the cooperative is still a fledgling. We have been in existence only one year and in that one year we have tried to provide everyone with everything. We are not a service provided by the University; we exist and are aided by the University, but receive no funds directly. We are a cooperative.

I should mention that the Program Development Committee recommended a toddler flexicare program. We were trying this type of program on a space available basis and discovered it did not work, either cost-effectively, or for the quality of care for the children. However, recognizing this type of care as a need, we have still kept 10 percent of the toddler program open for this care. At an emergency meeting of the parents Aug. 20, we again addressed this need. A committee was formed that night to work with the staff. Unfortunately, only two parents constituted that committee. They spent the next day at the cooperative making phone calls and struggling with budget figures and were unable to have anything for this fall. There is still hope for a January program, but the committee needs parents.

Any parent (or anyone) wishing to help the cooperative provide new and innovative programs, including the ones we had to discontinue, should come to the cooperative office at L-9 Jardine Terrace and leave your name and phone number and what you are interested in working on. We need parents willing to take on a leadership role. I especially encourage those of you who are angry with us. These programs can become a reality, but they have to be done by the people who want and need them — that's how the cooperative started, and the only way it can continue to function as a cooperative. We are still new, and changing. Please bear with us and help us.

Architecture college gains new programs

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This article is the second in a series on new administration.

The College of Architecture and Design is looking toward a full and exciting year including new faculty and new programs, Dean Mark Lapping said.

Change of 'State'

Two full-time assistant professors joined the staff in the college this year. Karen Weitze, from the University of California-Davis, is new to the Department of Environmental Design. Alan Tautges, from Colorado State University, joined the Department of Landscape Architecture.

"Weitze specializes in architectural history and historic preservation, so she will play a major part in renewing our historic program," Lapping said. "Tautges' specialty lies in site planning and design. We're delighted to have both people."

Several architecture faculty have been promoted this year. William Miller, Edward Devilbiss and Dennis Law were promoted to full professor. Lynn Ewanow, Lynn Norris-Baker and Fayez Husseini were promoted to associate professor.

In addition to new faculty and promotions, Lapping said, several new programs and projects will be implemented this year.

"The college will be inaugurating the Lee Bryant Lecture Series, which was named for a deceased alumnus, on Sept. 30," Lapping said. "Our first speaker will be art critic Robert Hughes."

Exchange programs with Denmark and West Germany for architecture students and faculty will be inaugurated this year also, Lapping said. Previously, the college has had an exchange program with the University of Copenhagen which will continue this year, he said.

The expansion of the Paul Weigel Library of Architecture and Design by 40 percent adds another new dimension to the college, Lapping said.

"This past year, the library was awarded the University's Center of Excellence, which allowed us to expand it and add more to its collections," he said. "We're really proud of our library."

Lapping stressed that opportunities for students in the college continue to grow, and part of that is because of the strong lines of communication between architecture faculty and employers of architecture graduates.

Increased rain hurts hay fever victims

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Although hay fever sufferers look forward to rain to relieve their symptoms, Dr. Dan Martin, staff physician at Lafene Student Health Center, said the increased rainfall this year has actually compounded their misery.

"The rain washes pollen out of the air, but that's temporary," Martin said. "The more rainfall you get, the more the weeds grow; thus more ragweed pollen is produced."

When pollen is inhaled by a person who doesn't have hay fever, phagocyte, a white blood cell that rids the body of pollutants, engulfs and destroys it.

The reason pollen affects hay fever sufferers is because they produce an antibody called immune globulin E, he said.

When pollen enters the body of a hay fever sufferer, antibody IGE attaches itself and forms a bond with the pollen.

When the bond is pulled into the phagocyte, the white blood cell releases a hormone called histamine. Histamine is released into the body and causes the common hay fever symptoms, he said.

"Histamine causes swelling of cells in the nose and the release of large quantities of mucus," he said. That is why hay fever sufferers have symptoms, including a runny or stuffy nose, sneezing and a sore throat.

Martin said he does not know why some people develop the antibody and others don't, but everyone has the potential to produce it.

Antihistamines can be taken to relieve hay fever symptoms.

"The reason antihistamines work is that they are chemically similar to histamine," he said.

When antihistamines are released into the body, they attach to pollen and block histamine from attaching itself.

Different kinds of antihistamines work depending on how similar they are to that person's histamine, he said. There are many brands of hay fever pills available but a lot of them have the same ingredients.

If a person has recently developed hay fever or is not responding well to his current medication, he should visit a doctor at Lafene, rather than experimenting with drugstore brands, Martin said.

"For the student population, it's actually cheaper to see a doctor and get a prescription."

He said hay fever sufferers should start taking medication at the beginning of the season to lessen the allergies' effects and to become immune to the drowsiness most antihistamines cause.

If pills are taken only when symptoms occur, the body will not have a chance to combat the tired feeling they produce.

"If you start taking pills early in the season, you don't get a pollen build-up, and when you stay on the medication on a regular basis, drowsiness will eventually fade away," he said.

The hay fever season begins late in August and ends after the first frost of the year. Until that time, in addition to taking antihistamines regularly, hay fever sufferers should keep their windows shut and the air conditioner on, he said.

Seldane, a prescription drug that has been available for about two years, is unique because it does not cause drowsiness in most patients. It also has been successful in inhibiting the release of histamine as well as blocking it, while regular antihistamines only block histamine, Martin said.

A nose spray, used to relieve asthma for more than 20 years, has the same effect and is now being prescribed for hay fever patients.

Soviet media accuse reporter of spying

By The Associated Press

Claim Daniloff contacted local agent

MOSCOW — The newspaper Izvestia on Monday accused Nicholas Daniloff of using a journalist's cover to ferret out military secrets about Afghanistan and claimed the American reporter worked with an alleged CIA agent in Moscow.

The government newspaper said the imprisoned correspondent for U.S. News & World Report was charged by a military prosecutor with espionage under a law that imposes penalties ranging from seven years in prison to death.

The article elaborated on accusations already made against Daniloff and expanded the charges against the reporter beyond the scope of the original claim that he received secret documents during what was described as a secret meeting with a Soviet in a Moscow park.

The arrest of Daniloff and the espionage charges filed Sunday by Soviet authorities have provoked a sharp reaction in Washington. Reagan administration officials have said the United States views the case as "a matter of utmost seriousness" that could affect Soviet-American relations.

Ruth Daniloff, who was scheduled to to see her husband today for the third time since his arrest on Aug. 30, called the Izvestia article "preposterous."

"It's absolutely crazy," she said. "It's just for domestic consumption while this case is being decided on a much higher level."

Izvestia tried to link Daniloff to Paul Stombaugh, a U.S. diplomat accused of being a CIA agent and expelled from the Soviet Union in June 1985.

It cited as evidence a note, allegedly given to a Soviet by Stombaugh, that said: "We would like to assure you that the letter delivered by you to the journalist on Jan. 24 got to the designated address."

Izvestia claimed Daniloff was the journalist mentioned in the letter.

Daniloff has been held in Moscow's Lefortovo prison since he was grabbed by eight KGB agents in a Moscow park. He told his wife he was picked up after a Soviet acquaintance named "Misha" gave him a packet purportedly containing press clippings but actually filled with maps marked secret and military photographs.

Izvestia said Daniloff was handed the indictment on Sunday at Lefortovo and required to sign it, which the paper said he did reluctantly.

In a telephone call to his office from prison on Sunday, Daniloff said he could be held six to nine months without a trial. He said he was told he is not yet entitled to a lawyer.

The charges appear to be based on the package handed to Daniloff and on accusations attributed to Misha that Daniloff tried to gather intelligence on the Soviet military in Afghanistan.

The Soviet Union intervened in Afghanistan in 1979 and there are more than 100,000 Red Army troops in the country.

Izvestia said Misha was detained at the same time as Daniloff, but it did not say whether he also was being charged or identify him further.

Editor's Note: This is the second in a series of stories featuring K-State athletic coaches. The series will appear Tuesdays on the sports page.

To say that John Capriotti was Steve Miller's understudy might be an understatement.

Capriotti, 30, took over as K-State's track and cross country coach after Miller resigned the position to concentrate full-time on his efforts as associate athletic director.

"Basically, everything I have learned is from Coach Miller," Capriotti said. "Ninety-nine percent of that in fact."

The Coaches of K-State

Capriotti first met Miller when he ran track for him at Bloom Township High School in Chicago. After competing his four-year prep campaign for Miller, Capriotti joined up with him again at Cal-Poly State in San Luis Obispo, Calif., where he ran three years under Miller's guidance and garnered All-America honors.

The relationship didn't end there, however. Capriotti joined Miller's staff as an assistant coach one season after Miller took over the Wildcat runners in 1981. After three years of grooming the distance runners, many to national prominence, Capriotti left to take over the women's track and cross country program at Northwestern.

"He taught me the profession as a coach and a person," Capriotti said of his 11-year stint under Miller. "The things I do and say have far-reaching ramifications. Also, the love-caring relation between a coach and athlete. He has taught me everything.

"If you are going to do something do it all out or not at all," Capriotti said. "Coach Miller is now the associate athletic director at K-State. He wants to be the best associate athletic director in the country. And, I want to be the best track coach in the country."

Being the best track coach in the country takes a lot of time to accomplish. Capriotti jokes that had he been married upon accepting the K-State job, he probably wouldn't be anymore.

Capriotti follows a daily regimen of running every morning at 7 a.m., working from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. and then going out for dinner. He spends the majority of his evening hours either at home or his office working on recruiting, he said.

"I have the best job in Manhattan," he said. "I know no one who has a better job than me. I wouldn't trade it for anything."

The first-year track boss has long been noted for his recruiting prowess. In fact, his first women's recruiting class at K-State as an assistant under Miller gathered a top-10 national finish in cross country.

"If I didn't get the best athletes to K-State," Capriotti said, "I wouldn't be doing my job. I will always get the best athletes out of Kansas every year — that is a promise. I love to recruit against KU head to head."

However close the two might be, Capriotti said he and Miller do have their differences. A stubbornness of sorts separates the two on occasion.

"He believes the things he knows are the only way and I think the things I know are the only way — but that is good. I believe the things I know are enough to get the job done here."

Part of getting that job done is getting the most he can from his athletes. It is a commitment Capriotti said he made to himself when he got into coaching.

"A lot of coaches have big egos, especially the established coaches. Their egos get in the way," Capriotti said. "I made a promise to myself that I would spend all my time coaching my athletes and not my ego."

New K-State track and cross country coach John Capriotti, who replaced Steve Miller as head coach, is once again working for Miller. Capriotti, who ran for Miller in high school and college, said 99 percent of what he has learned came from Miller.

Wildcat coaches cross international borders for athletic recruitment

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Getting the best athletes on a collegiate team sometimes involves more than spanning the country from East to West in search of talent.

Many coaches, including some at K-State, are now searching the globe in an attempt to go one-up on the competition.

"I have never recruited foreign athletes in the past," said track coach John Capriotti, who signed two Swedish runners to national letters of intent this past recruiting season. "The two kids from Sweden (Anneli Edling and Jan Jonsson) were kind of a fluke. I knew someone who put me in contact with them, and they were wanting to come here (United States) and go to school."

"They are great kids. They are here for a purpose and they are good people to be around," he said.

Placed in a little different circumstances, tennis coach Steve Bietau was put into a situation of elevating a Big Eight Conference cellar-dwellar. Finishing at the bottom of the conference pack every year didn't help Bietau's recruiting efforts when he came to K-State two years ago.

"When I came here we didn't have that great a reputation to recruit for," Bietau said. "With a foreign athlete they don't necessarily know the difference between Oklahoma State (a traditional conference champion) and K-State."

Bietau, who has attracted some quality Swedish players, said he first signed Sigrid Ivarsson, who has since left to finish school back in Sweden, and then found out about other players wanting to play at the collegiate level in the United States.

Adult magazine ranks 'Cats No. 2 in bottom-20 rankings

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Wildcat football players will undoubtedly find themselves in the spotlight for at least the next few days.

No, not because of their 1-1 start this season, but because they are in the latest issue of Penthouse.

And now for the rest of the story.

Yes, it's true. K-State's football team is featured in the October issue of the adult magazine which went on sale today.

But not to worry, the boys in purple aren't posing in the buff. Instead, the Wildcats are featured in an annual feature titled "20 Worst College Football Teams" authored by free-lance journalist Larry Linderman.

K-State is named in the "worst five" behind the "worst of the worst" Columbia, and ahead of the University of Texas-El Paso, Northwestern and Oregon State.

The Wildcats were the only Big Eight Conference team to make the "roster of the rotten," but another university from Kansas, Wichita State, was listed as the seventh-worst team in the nation.

Being named to a "list of losers" doesn't seem to bother head coach Stan Parrish, who, because of his reputation for rebuilding losing programs, said he has seen his share of similar polls before.

"Everybody has to make a living, and some people do that by (focusing) on the negatives. All we can do is continue to work hard and work in the right direction," Parrish said.

Linderman, in a telephone interview from his home in Sonoma, Calif., said his predictions are both serious and satire.

"It's kind of kidding, but it's also sort of serious," Linderman, a 1961 graduate of Temple University, said.

"I started on this satirical feature because I didn't want to do the same old thing where you name the top 10, 15 or 20 teams each year. In most cases, unless a traditional football power like Notre Dame hires a coach out of high school, the teams are basically the same."

Penthouse has printed the "20 Worst" feature for nine straight years, and a spokesperson in the public relations department said the magazine receives responses from college teams and their fans that make the not-so-elite list.

Linderman said he too receives reactions to his predictions.

"Oh, sure. I get news stories from fans when these teams win and letters and stuff," he said.

"One year, I had Wake Forest on the list and John Mackovic (now head coach of the Kansas City Chiefs) hung the article up and invited the players to do things to it. I don't even want to start on what they did to it."

Different factors, Linderman said, are responsible for a team being named one of the 20 worst college football teams.

"Some schools have difficult entrance requirements, and some schools play in a big-time football conference. It's no contest at all when a school like Rice squares off against a Texas," he said.

Linderman also relies on spring practice reports and tips from various sources — "not necessarily sportswriters" — from around the country.

And there have been times when the predictions turned out to be total-

Carlin says Hayden issuing false remarks

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin Monday accused Republican governor nominee Mike Hayden of misrepresenting Carlin's record on grain embargoes.

A spokesman for Hayden said the House speaker, who is opposing Democratic Lt. Gov. Tom Docking for the governorship in the November general election, stands by his statement.

At a joint appearance of the two candidates Saturday at the Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson, Hayden said Carlin originally supported an embargo former President Jimmy Carter imposed on grain shipments to the Soviet Union in 1979.

"Mike Hayden says I supported President Carter's grain embargo in 1979. That is false," Carlin said in a statement issued through his press office.

"The record will clearly show that I spoke out against a grain embargo, saying it would hurt no one but the American farmer. I sent that message directly to the president. Obviously, Mike Hayden has not checked the record."

The governor called Hayden's comment a "blatant misrepresentation" of his record on embargoes, and asked the GOP contender to retract his statement.

However, Kelley Hayden, the candidate's brother who serves as press secretary of his campaign, said Mike Hayden would retract nothing.

"We have heard from lots of people who say he (Carlin) supported it (the Carter grain embargo), then did a turnaround when he caught a lot of heat on it," said Kelley Hayden.

"He supported the embargo initially. He may have changed his mind, but initially he supported it."

Carlin said he refused to sign a resolution opposing Carter's grain embargo at a national governors' conference in 1979 because it was "a Republican-sponsored resolution designed to embarrass President Carter, not just to express opposition to the grain embargo."

The governor said he "refused to sign the resolution based on politics, not substance."

The issue of grain embargoes became a major one in the Hayden-Docking race after Hayden declared in a recent joint appearance in Manhattan that he supports strong economic sanctions against South Africa — including a grain embargo — to bring pressure on that nation to end its policy of racial separation called apartheid.

Kansas wheat farmers strongly oppose grain embargoes, contending they only hurt them economically and accomplish little as a foreign policy tool. Members of the Kansas Wheat Commission and the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers have issued statements critical of Hayden's position on a South Africa embargo.

Carlin accused Hayden of "misrepresenting my record on grain embargoes while trying to downplay his own documented support for grain embargoes."

Meanwhile, Hayden also caught criticism from two Democratic members of the Kansas House of Representatives, who accused him of fighting the farm debt interest buydown bill passed by the 1986 Legislature until the final vote, when he did vote for it.

Plane crew's escape sparks controversy

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The escape of Pan Am's cockpit crew at the start of the 17-hour hijacking in Pakistan has stirred debate over whether the ancient rule that a captain never abandons ship should apply to jetliner hijackings.

An informal Associated Press survey Monday found disagreement on the issue among pilots, airline officials and the hijack victims themselves. Opinions ranged from one survivor who called the cockpit crew's action "absolutely superb" to a spokesman for a competing airline who said it was "unthinkable."

By escaping through a hatch in the roof of the Boeing 747 soon after terrorists boarded the plane Friday, the three-man flight crew effectively grounded the jetliner at Karachi Airport.

But it left the nearly 400 passengers and remaining crew without an authority figure and confronting four terrorists, who in the end blasted them with grenades and machine-gun fire, killing 18 people.

"I feel that the decision that we made as the cockpit crew, and we made it together, was the best decision we ever made and I'm sure that you can tell by the results of how many people were saved," he said.

"There's no doubt in my mind that we made the correct decision.

Le Figaro, a leading French newspaper, said in an editorial Monday, "If one refers to the maritime world, where the tradition would have the captain of a sinking ship be the last to leave the deck, one could find quite cowardly the conduct of this crew."

"One will never know whether they fled to protect themselves or to help bring about a rapid conclusion," the newspaper said, although it said the crew should not be condemned for following airline security policies.

Terry Middleton, executive administrator of the London-based International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations, which represents 60,000 pilots in 66 nations, said the advantage of keeping a commandeered airliner grounded could outweigh all other considerations.

"It's not a question of bravery or cowardice," he said in an interview. "It is a question of doing the most sensible thing to get the hijacking over with as quickly and safely as possible."

A British Airways pilot, Chris Orlebar, said he had no doubt what he would do in the same circumstances. "I would stay on board and somehow disable the aircraft," he told London's Daily Mail newspaper.

But Shuli Naor, a captain for the Israeli airline El Al, quoted in the Tel Aviv newspaper Hadashot, disagreed.

"Look, if you drop the heroic business of the crew being the last to abandon ship — here it's the plane — when the crew abandons the plane, the plane becomes an unattractive object for hijacking," he was quoted as saying.

Jackson to visit Wichita, address rally

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas State Rainbow Coalition announced Monday the Rev. Jesse Jackson will visit Wichita Friday to address a voter education and registration rally at Wichita State University.

Darryl Gray, state coordinator of the Rainbow Coalition, said Jackson will speak at Henry Levitt Arena on the WSU campus at the 1 p.m. rally.

He said he hopes Jackson addresses such issues as low minority political participation, the political isolation of Kansas Indians and the grievances of black football players at Washburn University.

At a Statehouse news conference, Gray introduced George Wahquahboshkuk, chairman of the Prairie Band of the Potawatomi Indian Tribe of northeast Kansas.

The Prairie Band, which includes about 3,000 Indians, most of whom live on a reservation in Jackson County north of Topeka, has adopted a resolution endorsing the concept of the Rainbow Coalition, Wahquahboshkuk said. He also said he plans to go to Wichita to meet with Jackson Friday.

Also attending the news conference were the Rev. James Saiz of Wichita, a co-founder of the Rainbow Coalition in Kansas, and Curtis Pitts, president of the Black Student Union at Washburn, which is supporting five football players who quit playing in a protest over their situation on the Ichabod football team.

Gray called their separation from the football team the result of "blatant discrimination" and said he has requested a meeting with Washburn President John Green to discuss the episode. He also said the steering committee of the Kansas State Rainbow Coalition will investigate the situation.

"I have come to the opinion wrongs were committed and these students were discriminated against on the basis of race," said Gray.

Pitts said a meeting is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. Wednesday in the Washburn Student Union to discuss the football players' dismissal from the Washburn team.

Twenty eight players boycotted practice last week because of what they alleged were "broken promises" on scholarship agreements, lack of a tutorial program and the coaching staff's player evaluation system. After discussions, 23 of the players returned to the team.

Lashbrook, professor emeritus of journalism; and Harry Marsh, former journalism and mass communications department head.

Quiring said she enjoyed working with the project a great deal. She said she found Eisenhower's ideas to be interesting as well as compatible with her own.

"Milton Eisenhower was the first president to make drastic changes at the University," Quiring said. Under his leadership K-State grew from an agricultural college to a university with a broadening curriculum including liberal arts, she said.

One unique characteristic of the book is that its pages are made from acid-free paper which has an effective life of at least 300 years, Quiring said.

The book is being offered as a gift to those who join K-State's Friends of the Libraries during the fall semester.

This organization was begun in 1984 to enrich the resources and facilities available at Farrell and promote a greater awareness of the role of the library, Quiring said.

Joining Friends of the Libraries is the only way to obtain this particular edition of the book, but the group is also selling 100 limited editions which are numbered and come in a slip case, she said.

to pledge $1,000 each. Those Original 100, in turn, would try to sign up 10 other businesses, resulting in a total of 1,000.

Mills said the signing of the Original 100 is nearly accomplished, and he hopes to have the total 1,000 businesses signed by Thanksgiving.

The businesses can pay the $1,000 each year in one of three ways: one lump sum; $500 per semester; or $100 a month for 10 months, he said.

The money will be paid to the KSU Foundation, and "every penny" will go toward scholarships, Mills said.

Each scholarship will be named after the person or business giving it, and each recipient will receive a personal letter from Wefald.

"This money will only be used for new students not presently attending K-State," Mills said. "Hopefully, this will change the minds of those who are sitting on the fence and not able to decide which way to go."

Mills said the response to the project has been "tremendous."

"We've had a lot of cooperation from the KSU Foundation, the president's office and from Pat Bosco (assistant vice president for institutional advancement)," he said. "If the K-State recruiters do their job, I think we'll almost immediately turn around the enrollment problems."

Mills has nicknamed the project "Operation Survival."

"We just can't let it fail," he said. "We need all the help we can get."

Nuclear

temperature changes could occur on a much larger scale, he said.

"The exact amount of temperature change is a matter of real debate," Legg said. "The world's weather is terribly difficult to model. Nobody claims to do it well."

"Overall temperature drops have been estimated at, I think, as much as 20 degrees. Some are as low as 3 degrees. That doesn't sound like much, but as a worldwide average, that's a big difference. Glaciers are starting. You've got another ice age," Legg said.

Despite some points of uncertainty, scientists are in general agreement that dust and debris from a nuclear exchange could be enough to block out at least some sunlight from the Earth for weeks or months on end, causing considerable damage to both plant and animal life.

"The most serious problem would be if the sunlight were blocked out long enough, all the green plants would shrivel up and die," Legg said. "If it is a shorter term, but still real, problem, then you've got the problem of whether to use your supplies for food now or as seed for when the sun comes back."

The same is true with livestock. If the damage to green plants is severe, and since all animals depend ultimately on plants for food, a decision would have to be made at some point on whether to save breeding stock or to kill it for food, he said.

"This is one thing about nuclear winter. People are saying,'this is beyond all normal worries about radioactivity.' You'll still have all the cancers. But at a level beyond that, you are worried about killing off all the plants and animals.

"If ever somebody uses a nuclear bomb, there will be worldwide fallout. That's a given. That is a fear we have lived with since 1945; but nuclear winter is a new fear — a fear that even if somehow you could survive the fallout, there might not be any chance to come back, because of the sky darkening and the plants freezing," Legg said.

Jury selection is expected to take at least several days.

The defendants also include Gennaro "Jerry Lang" Langella, who was previously convicted of being Persico's second-in-command; Salvatore "Tom Mix" Santoro, the alleged Lucchese family underboss; Anthony Indelicato, an alleged low-level Bonanno family member accused of being a triggerman in the 1979 rubout of Bonanno boss Carmine Galante; and Ralph Scopo, a former construction labor leader who allegedly delivered payoffs from contractors who were victims of a commission shakedown scheme.

The case no longer includes any members of the city's largest and most powerful Mafia clan, the Gambino organization. Anniello Dellacroce, the Gambino underboss, died early last December, and two weeks later family boss Paul Castellano was murdered. The two had been indicted in the case.

Capriotti said although he signed his first overseas athletes last year, he is not currently recruiting any foreign athletes.

"I want to recruit the kids from Kansas and I am going to," Capriotti said.

In addition, first-year basketball coach Lon Kruger has brought Brazilian talent Fabio de Almeida, a 6-foot-6 swingman with him from his past stint at Pan American University.

"I want the best players to come to K-State, and as it worked out it turns out some foreigners have been among these players," Bietau said. "They are really taking a gamble coming over here (because of all the unknowns). But I have thoroughly enjoyed coaching all of them — they are great kids to be around."

Linderman stressed the fact that nothing personal was meant against K-State, the football team or its coaching staff by naming the Wildcats to the list.

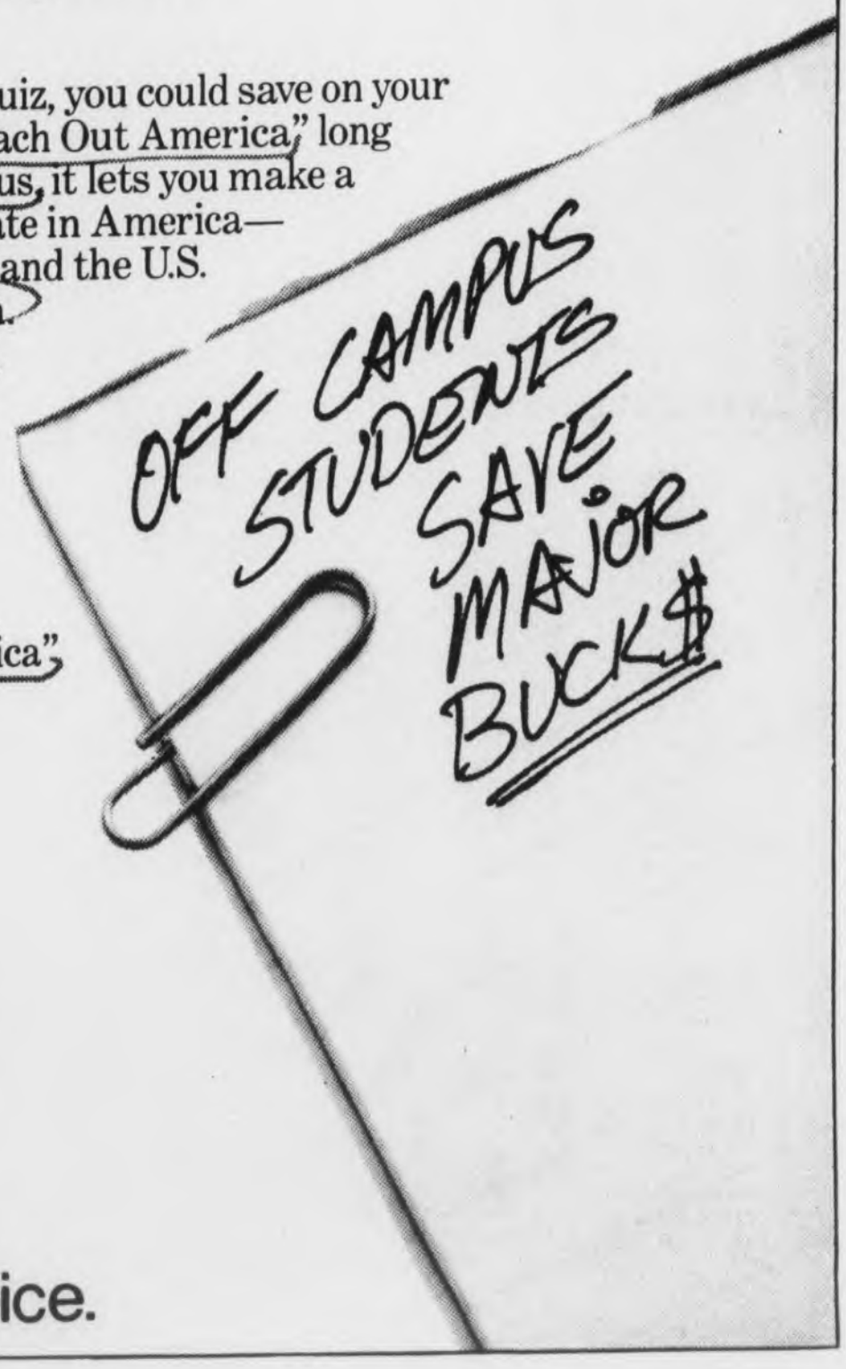
QUESTION #3.

WHAT EXACTLY IS AT&T'S "REACH OUT℠ AMERICA"?

a) A long distance calling plan that lets you make an hour's worth of calls to any other state in America for just $10.15 a month.

b) A 90-minute special starring "Up With People."

c) A great deal, because the second hour costs even less.



d) If you'd read the chapter on Manifest Destiny, you'd know.

e) Too good to pass up, because it lets you save 15% off AT&T's already discounted evening rates.

If you can guess the answers to this quiz, you could save on your long distance phone bill, with AT&T's "Reach Out America" long distance calling plan. If you live off campus, it lets you make a full hour's worth of calls to any other state in America—including Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands—for just $10.15 a month.

All you have to do is call weekends, 11pm Friday until 5pm Sunday, and every night from 11pm to 8am. Save 15% off our already discounted evening rates by calling between 5pm and 11pm Sunday through Friday. The money you could save will be easy to get used to.

To find more about "Reach Out America" or to order the service, call toll free today at 1 800 CALL ATT, that is 1 800 225-5288.

Bennett says students lack history training

History helps acquire life's values, ideals

By JONIE TRUED
Managing Editor

America and especially its young people are "missing a great deal" due to their lack of training in American history, said Secretary of Education William Bennett at the 73rd Landon Lecture Wednesday.

"Too many of our young people are ill-educated about the history, values and basic principles of our nation and civilization," Bennett said.

Bennett said the decline of formal history courses in grade schools and high schools has left its mark on the understanding Americans have regarding their own identity and origins.

Citing professor and author Paul Gagnon of the University of Massachusetts, Bennett said students arrive at colleges, after 12 years of school, knowing little about Athens and Rome, Czarist Russia, the history of science, technology, capitalism, socialism, or how America became involved in two world wars.

A recent study has evidenced these fears, Bennett said. A 1985 survey by the National Assessment of Education Progress showed how little juniors in high school know about American history.

As part of the cause for the lack of historical knowledge, Bennett cited a report issued by the National Education Association in about 1917. In the "The Cardinal Principles of Secondary Education" experts claimed that rather than formal study, the purpose of public education was to promote "social efficiency," Bennett said.

Social efficiency meant, he said, that studies not directly contributing to the social development of youth do not apply to the majority of students.

Studies not directly affecting human behavior, it was determined, included history. Ancient history disappeared from schools and four-year history sequences were cut to three, then two and, in some places, one, Bennett said.

Bennett said also social studies, consumer affairs, ecology and multicultural courses are not history courses, although they are often presumed to be by students' parents, and do not teach what formal history courses do.

With reference to the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 which sparked violence between the abolitionists and pro-slavers, Bennett said the only way students can

Secretary criticizes certification

By RHONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

Education systems in the United States rely too much on paper credentials, said Secretary of Education William J. Bennett at a meeting with educators Tuesday.

"In some places it's simply a matter of credentials (to get hired)," Bennett said. "I think rather than paper credentials, we should look at individual credentials and individual qualifications, for which the paper may or may not be sufficient evidence."

Before presenting the 73rd Landon Lecture on Public Issues, Bennett spoke in the Union Little Theatre to a crowd comprised mostly of faculty in the College of Education and Kansas superintendents. He emphasized the need to take a closer look at teacher certification and discussed a possible alternative.

In New Jersey, school boards are experimenting with three criteria for hiring new teachers. Bennett spoke about these qualifications as a general guide for teacher selection.

"I think the individual can come before the school committee, school board and principals and say I know my teaching material. I'm confident in the areas in which I wish to teach," he said. "Second, there are those who will vouch for my character. I will not be corrupting the young. Third, I believe I can show some ability to communicate to the young, that is to teach."

Bennett said New Jersey continues to hire most of its teachers from colleges of education. But in the past year or two, many other people from different backgrounds have applied. This has resulted in a larger pool of potential teachers to hire.

As a former teacher himself, Bennett is convinced that the ability to teach is an individual gift. Being able to teach effectively doesn't come with the territory or by taking certain classes, he said.

"People should major in geography in a liberal arts college if they want, major in elementary education in the college of education if they want, and then present themselves to the appropriate party if they want to teach," Bennett said. "We need to send a signal to all those people, whatever their background, that they are at least eligible to apply, and then (they should) be given an opportunity to demonstrate their ability."

Another concern of the federal government, Bennett said, is how much information the public has about education. Last year, "What Works," a book addressing the education topic, was published for the first time by the government. He said the book was a

Reagan seeks funds to build new shuttle

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan formally asked Congress Tuesday for money to restore the space shuttle fleet to four ships, even as the man he picked to rehabilitate NASA declared "a fifth orbiter is absolutely imperative."

NASA Administrator James C. Fletcher said a start on the fifth ship "will have to be made in the next year or two."

Reagan's approval of a replacement for the space shuttle Challenger was announced in August, and the request for $272 million to begin the first phase of construction had been expected.

The new ship, expected to be ready to fly in 1991, will cost about $2 billion. Other replacement costs, such as spare parts and space suits, will bring the total to $2.8 billion.

Fletcher told reporters last week that the country is going to be short of launch capacity by 1992 and "we really ought to have more than four" shuttles.

Responding Tuesday to a question from The Associated Press, Fletcher explained that, "Given the extraordinary demand for shuttle space to launch scientific, military and commercial cargo, as well as the demands of the space station launch timetable, we believe a fifth orbiter is absolutely imperative."

Fletcher reiterated that five shuttles will be essential for putting together the space station, which will serve as a permanent manned facility in space for conducting scientific, technological and commercial activities. President Reagan has designated the station as the next major space project.

Task force examines athletic fee plan

By The Collegian Staff

A nine-member Student Senate task force is researching a fee issue that would be paid for by all students at enrollment to help maintain the University's athletic programs.

The task force is also delving into last season's and current budgets released by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Five senators and four at-large members have met with Michael Jones, the athletic department's business manager, at the Student Governing Services Office in the Union the past two Tuesdays to discuss the athletic department's budget.

Jones explained individual line items on the 1985-86 unaudited budget and answered the committee's questions on athletic department procedures.

According to unaudited figures given to the task force Tuesday, the athletic department budgeted $4,687,100 for expenses for July 1, 1985 to June 30, 1986, and expended $4,972,052.18. The excess amounts to $284,952.18.

On the revenue side, which was also unaudited, the department budgeted for $5,338,900 in total revenues in fiscal 1985-86, and received $4,732,981.66. The figure was $605,918.34 under the budgeted amount.

Jones, in his first year at K-State, told the task force he wasn't sure when the budget would be audited.

The task force plans to review the 1986-87 budget at next Tuesday's meeting and later will make a recommendation to the Student Senate on the fee proposal.

University officials expressed interest in the fee last spring in the hopes that enrollment would increase.

Season ticket sales in football and basketball were under budget last year, and Jones told the task force that current football season tickets sales also saw a slight decrease from last year.

Gunmen kidnap American in Lebanon

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — An American who runs a private school in Beirut was kidnapped by two armed men while on his way to play golf Tuesday, and a caller claimed responsibility in the name of the Shiite Moslem group Islamic Jihad.

It was the first kidnapping of an American in Lebanon in 15 months.

The U.S. Embassy identified the victim as Frank Herbert Reed, 53, of Malden, Mass., director of the Lebanese International School in Moslem west Beirut.

A rash of politically motivated kidnappings in west Beirut in 1985 prompted most Americans and other Westerners to leave the city.

A school associate said Reed has lived in Lebanon about eight years and had converted to Islam before marrying Sahmiya Dalati, a Syrian. The associate, who insisted on anonymity, said the couple have a five-year old son, Tareq.

Islamic Jihad, which espouses the fundamentalist teachings of Iran's Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, has said it holds at least three other American hostages.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Christopher P. English said the embassy "does not have many details about it (the kidnap) now."

At the State Department in Washington, spokesman Bernard Kalb said, "We call on those who may be holding Mr. Reed as well as the other foreign hostages in Lebanon to release their captives immediately. We remind them further that we hold them responsible for the well-being of their captives."

Group claims terrorist bombings

PARIS — A previously unknown group called Partisans of Right and Freedom claimed responsibility Tuesday for the bombing of a post office in Paris city hall. The blast killed a postal worker and injured 19 people.

In a statement left in the mail box of a Western news agency in Beirut, Lebanon, the group also said it was responsible for all other terrorist attacks in France since December 1985.

The group criticized another organization, the Committee for Solidarity with Arab Political Prisoners and the Middle East, for claiming it carried out some of the bombings. The committee did not claim responsibility for the post office blast.

The Monday night explosion killed 51-year-old Marguerite Thuault, an employee at the post office, authorities said. It blew out windows and window frames on one side of the building and devastated the interior of the post office.

Police refused to confirm a broadcast report that a German tourist had taken pictures of men running from the post office and turned the film over to investigators.

First lady's maid pleads innocent

RICHMOND, Va. — Nancy Reagan's personal maid and two other people pleaded innocent Tuesday to being part of a conspiracy to smuggle munitions out of the United States, but a fourth person failed to appear.

Anita Sanabria Castelo, 45, of Tacoma Park, Md., a member of the White House staff, and two of the three men charged in the alleged plot appeared before U.S. District Judge Robert R. Merhige Jr.

They face charges of conspiring to export ammunition without a license and exporting ammunition without a license.

Also entering pleas were Julio Cesar Baez Acosta, of Paraguay and Eugenio Silva of Richmond. All are free on bond.

None of the defendants made any comment beyond stating their pleas.

The fourth person charged, Hernan Pedermo Duarte, also of Paraguay, did not appear in court and Assistant U.S. Attorney Gregory Welsh said he is a fugitive.

Castelo, a native of Paraguay, and the others allegedly conspired from November 1985 to Aug. 5 to buy .22-caliber ammunition in Richmond and ship it to Paraguay aboard a freighter captained by Acosta.

Duarte was the chief officer aboard the Marsical Jose Felix Estigarribia. Authorities seized 350,000 rounds of ammunition aboard the ship the night of Aug. 4.

KU cyclist dies in truck collision

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A University of Kansas student who was injured when his bicycle collided with a truck during a triathalon died early Tuesday, hospital officials said.

Paul Childs, 20, of Fairway, Kan., died at 1:35 a.m., said Pat Jordan, a spokeswoman for Truman Medical Center.

Childs was hurt Sunday while riding in the Baptist Medical Center Triathalon. His bike collided with a truck at a Missouri 150 intersection in Lee's Summit.

Bill Bell, who won the race, said he and Childs were fighting for the lead with about three miles to go in the race when the accident happened. Bell said he saw a police officer wave the truck through the intersection, but that Childs had his head down and did not see the truck.

State fair crowds increase this year

HUTCHINSON — Attendance at the Kansas State Fair is running about 10 percent ahead of last year, according to spokesman Bill Leslie.

Leslie said Tuesday that paid attendance from Saturday through Monday was 109,592, compared to 99,012 for the same period last year. The fair drew 52,239 on Saturday, when gubernatorial candidates Tom Docking and Mike Hayden made a joint appearance and the Oak Ridge Boys entertained.

Sunday's crowd was 40,148, and 17,205 went to the fair on Monday.

The 10-day fair — with nine days of paid attendance — runs through Sunday. Last year it drew just under 300,000, down from about 340,000 in 1984.

Historians find views on education narrow

By SUE DAWSON
News Editor

Members of the Department of History said parts of the 73rd Landon Lecture on Public Issues, delivered Tuesday by Secretary of Education William Bennett, were positive but disagreed with Bennett's narrow view on education and history.

Marion Gray, associate professor of history, teaches Senior Seminar for Secondary Teachers, a class that prepares seniors for student teaching.

Gray said he was pleased with Bennett's emphasis on the value of history in education and how a student can gain better self-knowlege. But he said he did not agree with the "narrowness of his (Bennett's) view."

"I think he's representing an almost polemical kind of history that doesn't encourage (students) to open and stretch their minds," Gray said.

Gray said Bennett stressed the importance of tradition over social studies themselves.

"I think that expresses his limited view on what this discipline should do and can do.

"I fear that his audience believes that if one values history, one also values the other things he talked about," Gray said, referring to his belief that Bennett stressed American history as the most important.

Gray said social studies are good if they assess and process the ways and beliefs of other cultures.

"History should help people understand how others do things," he said, "and that one way has no correctness to it."

John McCullough, head of the history department, agreed with Bennett and Gray that history puts the student in contact with the past as well as with himself. But he said he believes social studies have their own place in history.

"There are parallels between history and other social studies," he said, "but the problem with the social studies is that it can become such an oleo of certain things that it ends up having relatively little content that is definable in any circumstances."

McCullough said the question Bennett answered on the issue of agriculture classes for primary and secondary education students illustrated the pressures on educators to "do everything for everybody."

"At that point, it becomes impossible because there is no common core (of basic classes)," he said.

McCullough said the core classes should be math, English, history and science and should begin early in a student's education so he can expand into other fields of study.

Many students arrive at the University with limited knowlege of history, McCullough said.

"They come basically with one year of American history," he said. "They simply do not have anything in the way of depth of background."

McCullough said students often study the same topics repeatedly without making progress in that area, but it is only American history that they study systematically.

Gray also said the students come into the history program with limited history backgrounds.

"Certainly I couldn't say I'm pleased with the history backgrounds they (students) have," Gray said. "But it is not as bad as he (Bennett) said."

Tom Kirker, graduate in history and president of the history honorary Phi Alpha Theta, said he agreed with Bennett that history must be taught in grade and secondary schools. But he said Bennett left out important modern trends including women's education, illiteracy and financing higher education.

"He left out the meat of the topic," Kirker said. "My gripe is the point that grad school is expensive, yet the Reagan administration is cutting aid."

Kirker said, however, that learning history should be more than learning the names of the presidents and important dates.

Bill to help educationally deprived

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

A new bill for an education voucher program to help parents of children served by Chapter 1 will be introduced in Congress during the next session.

Chapter 1 provides money for educationally deprived children and can be used in both public and private schools.

The bill "includes fresh proposals" and will satisfy requirements set down by the Reagan Administration, said Wendell Willkie, general counsel for the Department of Education. Willkie responded to questions at a press conference following Secretary of Education William Bennett's address at the 73rd Landon Lecture on Public Issues.

A proposal for the program was introduced in February and was defeated, he said.

"We don't anticipate anymore action this session," Willkie said.

There would be no attempt made to re-evaluate the February bill, but efforts would be put into presenting a new bill next session, he said.

"We haven't made any of the hard decisions yet considering this bill," Willkie said, referring to the fact that no specific decisions could be released concerning the new voucher effort.

The February bill, called the Equity and Choice Act, would have given parents vouchers they could use to pay tuition for their children at any school of their choice. The vouchers would have been based on the amount the local public school spends per child for Chapter 1 services.

According to Anne C. Lewis, writing in the "Phi Delta Kappan," the act, called TEACH, had three purposes: it would have given poor parents a choice in their children's education, it would have increased the involvement of parents in the education process and it would have introduced much-needed competition in education.

Lewis said reaction from public school groups was entirely negative. These groups argued that Chapter 1 is one of the most successful federal education programs in the government.

Also, they said the new plan would have had higher administrative costs than the current program and they felt the program would have made education more unequal under TEACH.

Proponents embrace the idea of putting more competition into education.

With vouchers, "poor families would have the education alternatives now open only to the middle class and the rich," Gary S. Becker, economics professor at the University of Chicago, said in Business Week magazine.

Becker went on to say the system "would require public schools to compete for students."

"Public schools," he said, "could compete effectively only if they suppressed violence, instilled discipline, involved parents, offered a challenging curriculum and controlled costs."

Another challenge mounted against TEACH is that it didn't require the vouchers to be used at schools meeting state requirements for compulsory attendance.

Schools where the vouchers could have been spent were required to provide a "full-time program" of elementary and secondary education and must have been considered tax-exempt under the Internal Revenue Code.

The tax-exemption status is granted to schools not practicing racial discrimination.

This is not the first time the Reagan Administration has tried to push an education voucher bill through Congress. In 1983, a similar voucher plan was introduced in the Senate and was defeated 50-38 on a roll call vote even though the Republicans had a six-vote margin.

Republican senators who voted against the bill said they did so because it didn't include any provision requiring the vouchers to be spent at schools meeting state quality standards.

State should regulate debris in ag products

It appears the Kansas farmer has gotten the bureaucratic shaft once again.

As if high interest rates, low grain prices and farm foreclosures aren't enough, Attorney General Robert Stephan said last week that a Kansas Bureau of Investigation report has revealed Kansas soybeans were intentionally soiled with 300 tons of dirt before they were shipped from a Kansas grain elevator to overseas customers in 1984.

What this means is, on top of everything else, the image of the Kansas farmer is now in doubt in the international market. This doubt, if not immediately reversed, will cripple the American farmer.

Because foreign customers are already able to purchase higher quality grain at lower prices from such countries as Australia and Argentina, the probability of them doing business with a country that intentionally adds dirt to its grain will grow less and less.

For the first time, American farmers are faced with the possibility that, due to reasons beyond their control, their grain will not be regarded as the finest in the world.

What makes this information so disturbing is that it didn't have to happen.

There are no laws stating that dirt can't be added; there are only laws dictating how much may be added. The rationale behind the existing law is sound because dirt and other debris make their way into grain naturally.

However, unless there is a law against intentionally adding dirt, some companies will abuse the law for the purpose of short-term financial gain. And that abuse will come ultimately at the expense of the farmer.

Furthermore, farmers themselves are penalized when they deliver below-par grain to the elevators. Farmers are not at fault.

Stephan, appropriately, has expressed anger over the KBI report and he has made an appeal to Kansas legislators to adopt a law making it illegal to intentionally add dirt or other foreign material to Kansas grain.

Only the legislators' expediency in adopting such a law will preserve any faith in the system the Kansas farmer has left.

Legislators to decide U.S. defense budget

One sizeable task ahead of legislators as they reconvene will be to reconcile differences in the Senate and House versions of next year's Pentagon budget.

Although there are literally hundreds of differences in the two versions, the main items in contention will be five arms control amendments in the House version. The amendments include the following:

— A freeze on Strategic Defense Initiative spending.

— A ban on the testing of anti-satellite weapons.

— A moratorium on nuclear testing.

— A requirement that the Reagan administration continue to comply with the SALT II arms control treaty.

President Reagan has promised to veto any final version if it contains the arms control provisions, viewing them as a major setback for his SDI program and citing a need for a stronger defense program.

The total dollar amount of the defense budget represents another split between what arms control-minded Democrats in the House want and what Reagan believes necessary for national security. The House has authorized $287 billion, while Reagan requested $320 billion. Even the Republican-controlled Senate voted $295 billion, also far below Reagan's request.

With more than 15 percent of Americans living below the poverty level, it is unfortunate Reagan is intent on spending so much money on weapons. Although the United States already possesses the capability to destroy the planet many times over, the Reagan administration seems intent on expanding the superfluous arsenal and with it the astronomical federal budget deficit. Hopefully, Reagan and the "hawks" in the defense department will realize that homeless people of this country can't live in missile silos.

Letter

Stop arms buildup

Editor,

Re: Richard R. Ortiz's letter "SDI balances power" in the Sept. 3 Collegian.

In Ortiz's opening sentence, he claims that Collegian columnist Scott Miller had "not done his full homework" when writing his Aug. 28 column, "'Star Wars' hurts chance for peace." Ortiz then writes, "At present the Soviet Union holds an estimated 10,000 more nuclear warheads than does the United States."

Ortiz, it appears, is the one who has not done his full homework.

According to the Christian Science Monitor, Aug. 29, 1986, a recent Congressional Research Service report states that "The U.S. now has a slight lead in warhead numbers, with 11,639 to 9,924 for the Soviets." The report goes on to state that if the superpowers continue to abide by the SALT limitations, the United States would lose its lead by 1990 with 12,528 nuclear charges to the U.S.S.R.'s 13,130.

Christian Science Monitor projections for the year 2000 are as follows: With SALT restrictions, U.S., 11,884; U.S.S.R., 15,724; moderate buildup, U.S., 13,060; U.S.S.R., 20,934: substantial buildup, U.S., 20,326; U.S.S.R., 25,794.

The only conclusion is that, no matter what, the Soviets will be ahead of us in the warhead numbers game. With this in mind, Miller's plea to President Reagan to "let Gorbachev put his missles where his mouth is" makes all the more sense. Only with limitations that go beyond SALT II can the United States hope to balance the numbers.

As for Strategic Defense Initiative, the Christian Science Monitor reports that the Soviets plan to add substantially to their forces of intercontinental bombers in the coming years. SDI is not designed to deal with intercontinental bombers.

Each superpower can destroy the other several times over. It's time to stop this wasteful buildup and start applying ourselves seriously to arms reductions.

Pakistani people desire democracy

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

The shah of Iran, Anastasio Somoza, Ferdinand Marcos and Jean-Claude Duvalier may soon have a new member in the deposed dictator club — Gen. Mohammed Zia ul-Haq, the president and chief general of Pakistan. Although not quite as ruthless as a Marcos or a Somoza, the Pakistanis, no doubt, will be glad to see Zia go.

After seizing power in a 1977 military coup, Zia promised free elections within 90 days, a promise that never materialized. Today, Zia remains in power as both president and the highest military official in the country — a situation that would be unconstitutional had Zia himself not changed the 1973 constitution to accommodate the situation.

In December 1984, Zia conducted a nationwide referendum that basically asked Pakistanis if they approved of Islamic principals. As one might expect in a population comprised of more than 90 percent Muslims, the referendum was overwhelmingly approved by 98 percent of the voters.

Zia, who at the time was incorporating his interpretations of Islamic scripture into governmental policies, took the referendum results as an indication that he was the people's choice. He declared himself president and set the next presidential "election" for 1990, before the people were aware they had even had an "election."

Although Zia did allow parliamentary elections in February 1985, local elections in 1979 and 1983 and ended martial law in December 1985, his human rights and civil liberties records certainly haven't won him any friends among the people. Part of Zia's "Islamization" process includes flogging suspected criminals.

Recently, I saw a taped segment of "60 Minutes" in which a man was flogged. After a few screams of pain the ritual ended with the victim collapsing to the ground. This gruesome scene was juxtaposed with an interview with Zia during which he said flogging was not meant to hurt a person but to benefit his soul. Quite a guy that Zia is.

One Pakistani scholar, Aijaz Ahmed, wrote in 1983, "(P)hysical torture has of course always been widespread in Pakistan, but no previous government has been brazen enough to institutionalize it or even confess it; now corporal punishments, such as amputation of limbs, have been made part of the penal code..."

As another aspect of his "Islamization" policies, Zia has placed the value of women at half that of men. If a woman were raped, for instance, she would need her testimony corroborated by that of another woman to equal the testimony of a male defendant who denied the charge.

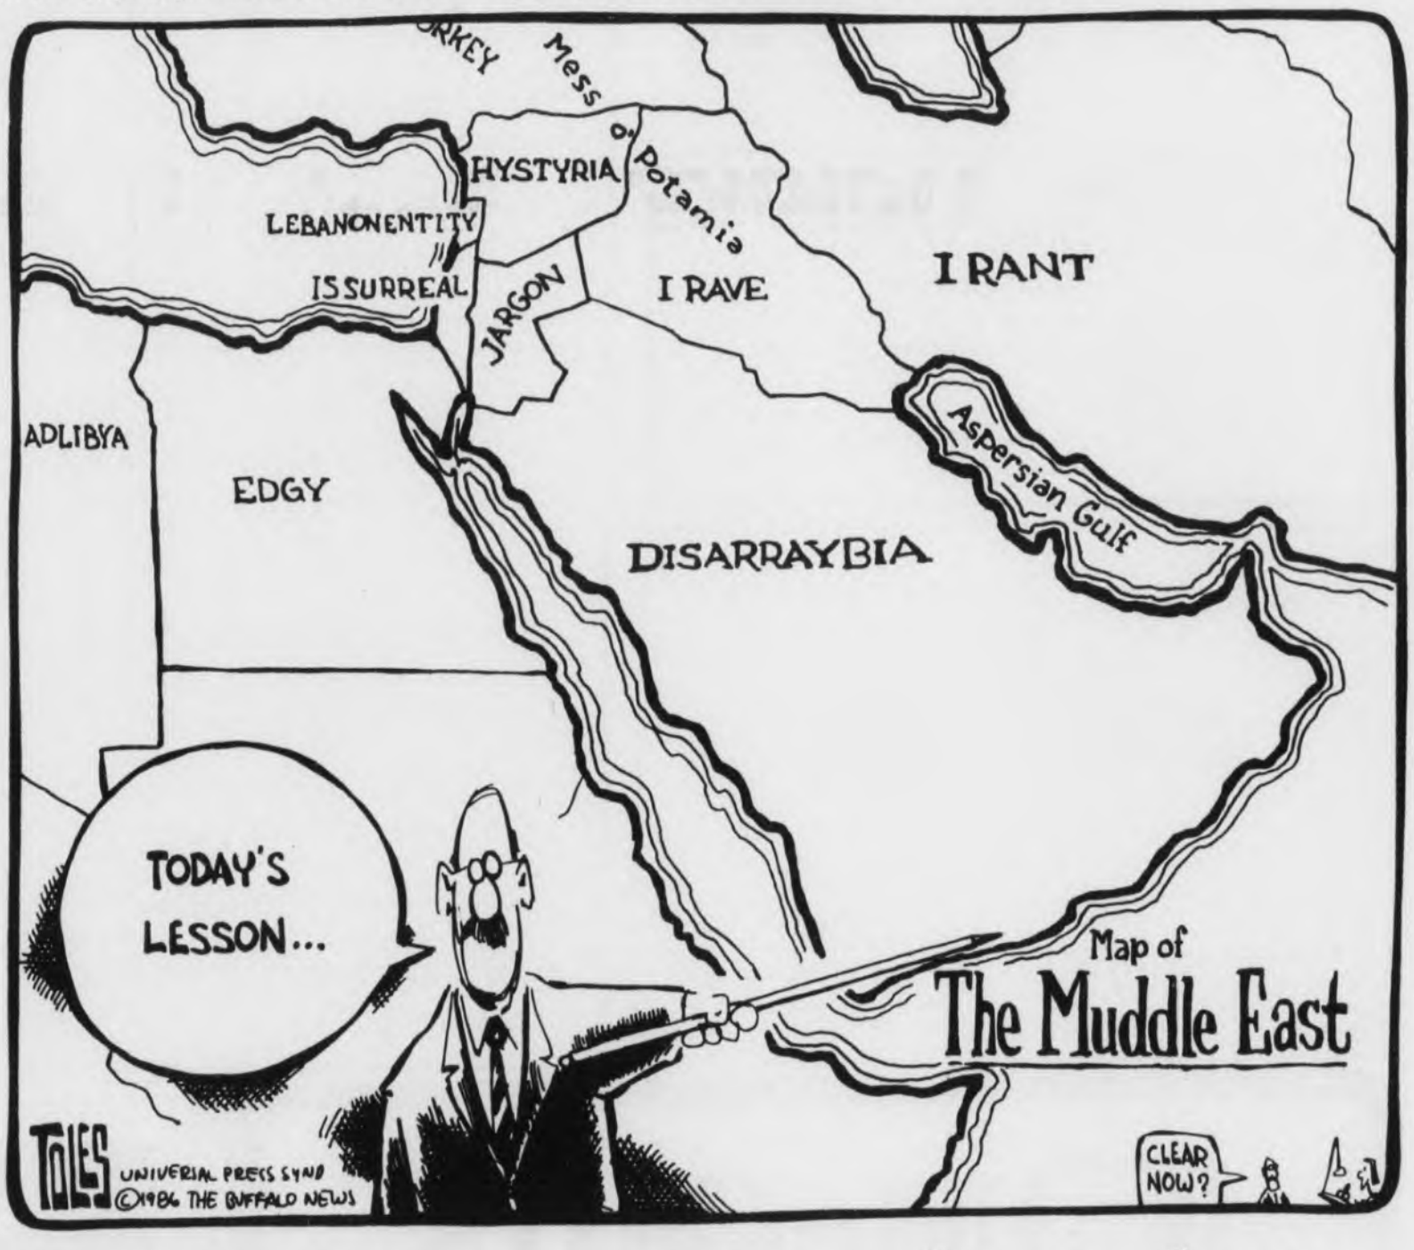
A group of Pakistani women formed the Woman's Action Forum to protest Zia's policies. But in an article in the March 1986 issue of Current History, William Richter, head of the Department of Political Science at K-State, stated, "WAF members have taken to the streets to protest and have been assaulted and arrested by the police for their struggle against the laws that reinforce their legal inequality."

Not surprisingly, widespread opposition to Zia has flared this summer. The number of street riots, demonstrations and clashes with police have been increasing while political groups organized a coalition known as the Movement for the Restoration of Democracy.

One of the opposition groups in the coalition is the Pakistan Peoples Party, led by Benazir Bhutto, who was released from a Landhi jail after a crackdown on opposition earlier this summer. If her name sounds familiar, it should. Her father, the late Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, was the prime minister whom Zia deposed in 1977 and had hanged in 1979.

Backed by throngs of followers, the younger Bhutto has called for the ouster of Zia and for free elections to be conducted immediately. She plans to run in 1990 if her requests go unanswered. But if Pakistanis agree that Zia's time to step down has come, they disagree on whether Bhutto is the choice for the next president.

In an economy drained over the years by wealthy elite and foreign corporations, Pakistanis are concerned that Bhutto, the daughter of a wealthy landowner, and her thus far ambiguous economic policies would not provide radical change. It is change they see as necessary to indigenous economic development rather than what Pakistani economists Hassan Gardezi and Jamil Rashid call, "the use of cheap and docile labour...in medium technology industries owned by transnational mega-corporations."



Another question, one of great importance to all Pakistanis, is what course Bhutto's foreign policy would take, especially with respect to the United States upon which Pakistan is now more economically dependent than ever. Bhutto claims to be committed to "genuine" non-alliance and calls for a "negotiated settlement" in neighboring Afghanistan, where "genuine" non-alliance could be the key to getting out of a superpower struggle.

Which reminds me, where does the United States stand in all this? The answer is, right where we've always been, standing firmly behind our propped-up dictator. Over the course of the next five years, the United States will give the Zia regime $4 billion. More than half of it will go to the military, a military that is probably more oppressive than protective.

Instead of pushing Zia for real economic, educational and political reforms, the United States has been content to donate a few billion dollars in return for the right to establish military bases. Unfortunately for American interests — whether they be political, military or economic — the Pakistanis almost certainly will discard them at the same time Zia's inevitable downfall occurs.

As syndicated columnist Richard Reeves put it, "Perhaps neither will be thrown out right now, but someday both will; Zia will go because he is a despot and the United States because it pretended otherwise."

But how can one be so sure that Zia will inevitably join the deposed dictator club? One really can't, but there is always hope. Without hope there wouldn't be a deposed dictator club.

Farrell changes to benefit students

SUSAN BAIRD
Collegian Columnist

This summer the University Library Committee approved two major changes in the operations of Farrell Library.

One improvement occurred in the periodicals reading room on the second floor. Originally, enclosed study booths were along the room's eastern and northern walls. Magazine racks filled the southern two-thirds of the room, while open tables and individual study booths occupied the northern third.

At either end of the long bar enclosing the reading area were passageways. Student employees sat at desks near these openings to search students' backpacks for magazines and newspapers.

Over the summer, the library staff removed the study booths. Racks containing periodicals stretch across the eastern side of the room, while large, open tables fill the western side of the reading area. A security gate similar to the one at the library's entrance will be installed in the center of the long bar. The northern exit will be closed permanently and the southern exit will become an emergency gate.

One problem with the room's earlier arrangement was the high rate of mutilation to periodicals. The individual study booths and study rooms gave students a semi-private reading area.

Many students took advantage of the privacy to cut articles, advertisements and pictures out of the periodicals or write graffiti on the walls. Others used the rooms as lunchrooms and lounging areas instead of study and research areas. Employees would search the rooms throughout the day to pick up trash and stacks of periodicals.

Not only were these students abusing the library's facilities, they inconvienced other students who could have used the areas to study. Moreover, they ruined periodicals the other students needed to use.

To prevent the abuse, the library staff decided to eliminate the enclosed areas and use open tables. In a centralized open area, few students would have the courage to tear out articles or pictures. In addition, moving the periodicals' racks along the wall will provide more room for expanding the quantity of periodicals.

Another problem was the security system. Few student workers enjoyed searching other students' backpacks as they left the area. Moreover, usage of the room didn't warrant hiring students to work both desks continually. When the library installs the central security gate, a student employee may make better use of the time by filing periodicals and helping people find the correct information.

The second change was the check-out period for bound periodicals. Originally, students could check out bound magazines from the stacks for a seven-day period. Having a book out of circulation for that length of time inconvienced other students.

Now the check-out period is three days. To further accommodate students, the library made the shelving of bound periodicals a priority. Students now have easier access to the information they need within the time they need it.

Both of these changes will improve the library's service to students and University personnel. Take advantage of these improvements and utilize the library's services.

Arts and Sciences contracts department heads, faculty

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This article is the third in a series on new administration.

In addition to adding new faculty members to its staff, the College of Arts and Sciences has had several changes in administration, Dean William Stamey said.

Change of 'State'

In August, Larry Noble was named the new head of the Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies. Since 1972, Noble has been on the K-State faculty, where he has served as associate professor, professor and coordinator of PEDLS graduate studies.

Carol Oukrop is the new head of the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications. Oukrop has taught the news-editorial and public relations sequences since 1969, except for a one-year leave of absence when she accepted a visiting professorship at the University of Hawaii from the fall of 1983 until June 1984.

Associate professor Robin Smith is serving as acting head of the Department of Philosophy. He is replacing Charles Reagan, who is serving as assistant to the president.

Stephen Riggs has been appointed as interim director of McCain Auditorium, replacing Rick Deihl, who resigned to take a position at Miami University in Ohio.

There also are many new faculty members. The Department of Aerospace Studies added John Taglieri, an assistant professor who was a communications officer with Peterson Air Force Base in Colorado Springs, Colo.

David Hartnett and Steve Upton, assistant professors, join the Division of Biology. Hartnett was an assistant professor at the University of South Florida in Tampa, and Upton was doing research and teaching at the University of Texas-El Paso.

In the Department of Biochemistry, Ramaswamy Krishnamoorthi is a new assistant professor. Krishnamoorthi was recently doing post-doctoral work at the University of Wisconsin.

David Schmidt and Maria Zamfir-Bleyberg are new assistant professors in the Department of Computer Science. Schmidt recently completed a two-year fellowship at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland. Bleyberg was a professor at the University of California.

David Smit is a new assistant professor in the Department of English. Smit recently completed his doctorate at the University of Iowa.

Rene de la Pedraja Toman is a new assistant professor in the Department of History. Toman recently worked at the University of Bogota in Colombia.

Robert Pearce joins the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications as an associate professor. Pearce will be teaching advertising and is the Advertising Club adviser.

In the Department of Modern Languages, C. Lucia Garavito is a new assistant professor. Garavito received her master's and doctoral degrees from the University of Kansas.

Brett DePaola and Robert Panoff are new assistant professors in the Department of Physics. DePaola recently worked at the Joint Laboratory for Astrophysics in Boulder, Colo. Panoff is formerly with Courant Institute for Mathematical Science at New York University.

Margery Ambrosius is a new assistant professor in the Department of Political Science. She recently completed her doctorate at the University of Nebraska.

Two new assistant professors join the Department of Statistics. James Neill is formerly with Upjohn Pharmaceuticals. Schwenke is formerly with Bristol Myers.

New instructors in the College of Arts and Sciences are Annette Funk in the Department of Music and Linda Hoag in the Department of Speech.

Stamey said a new mathematics office in the college will have an impact in all of the arts and sciences departments.

"This new office involves helping undergraduates in their placement in mathematics classes," Stamey said. "Since some form of mathematics is required for every major in this college, the office will make the placement process that much easier."

Stamey also said a new trend for the college is an increase in the enrollment of graduate students.

Card system aids students, faculty in gaining access to copy machines

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

Students getting photocopies at Farrell Library will no longer have to dig through dirty laundry for coins to operate the machines.

A copy card system has been installed at Farrell, said Charlene Grass, associate dean for technical services.

This system requires the use of a card, rather than coins, to make copies. Grass said Farrell recently acquired three new Xerox copiers that operate in this manner.

"We replaced three of our older copiers with these copiers," Grass said. "They (the new copiers) make much higher-quality copies, plus they can also make reductions."

People can purchase a copy card for $5 at the circulation desk. The card enables a user to make 88 copies.

Ann Scott, Farrell's assistant director for administrative services, said the copy card system is the coming thing in copiers.

"It is a trend in academic libraries to go with card systems," Scott said. "Other libraries have reported great satisfaction with them."

Grass said the copy card system has advantages for users of the new copiers.

"Users don't have to mess with change, they get better reproductions and they essentially get more for their money," Grass said.

To make 88 copies on Farrell's coin-operated copiers costs $4.40. The new copiers' reduction function makes it possible to make 176 copies for the $5 cost of the card. This could save a user $3.80.

Scott said the new system also benefits Farrell employees.

"The problem of collecting money every day from those machines is eliminated," Scott said. "Plus, we have to pay taxes on the money collected from the copiers. That cost is now covered in the cost of the copy card. We don't have to worry about paying one cent for every 15 cents collected in the coin-operated copiers."

Grass said two of the new copiers are located on the first floor of Farrell. The third copier is located in the Periodicals Reading Room on the second floor.

Scott said that as of Monday, approximately 75 copy cards had been sold. She said Farrell is going to try to acquire three copy card copiers each year until all eight of the coin-operated copiers are replaced.

Panel analyzes nuclear winter theory

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

The third year of pre-convocation forums began Tuesday evening when four University professors discussed the atmospheric and cultural effects of nuclear warfare.

The panelists discussed nuclear winter and accepted questions from an audience of about 40.

"Our intentions are to make you think a little about the subject of nuclear winter before the convocation lecture on Thursday," said Dean Bark, professor of physics.

George Carrier, chairman of the National Academy of Science study group on nuclear winter, will deliver the semester's first All-University Concovation lecture at 1:30 p.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

"Nuclear winter" is a phrase used by scientists to explain the possibility of harmful atmospheric and ecological effects of a nuclear war.

"The atmosphere is a physical system that obeys physical laws," Bark said. "With the age of nuclear warfare, man has the ability to dirty the 'glass' of the atmosphere to extreme proportions."

Although the actual data of the effects on the earth's ecology are thin, everyone generally agrees some disastrous effects would result from large-scale nuclear warfare, said Ted Barkley, professor of biology.

"Everyone seems to think that the world would be somewhat colder and darker," Barkley said. "Since temperature is the prime control of vegetation, serious consequences could result."

Pat O'Brien, professor of anthropology, discussed the cultural effects of a nuclear winter.

"If such a thing occurs, it could make us extinct," O'Brien said. "If we had a nuclear holocaust, we wouldn't be able to go back to our way of life." The nuclear holocaust, she said, would most likely result in destruction of plants and animals and a breakdown in transportation and communication.

Alden Williams, professor of political science, said that from the political point of view, "(The concept of) nuclear winter is as real before detonation as it is after."

UPC event highlights outdoor organizations

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Program Council will sponsor "Outdoor Awareness Day," today from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. between Seaton Hall and the Union.

The event will be promoting outdoor sports and activity awareness, as well as various outdoor organizations in Manhattan.

Mike Penner, UPC graduate assistant program adviser, said many organizations will be participating in the event including the KSU Sailing Club, Blue River Water Sport, Northern Flint Hills Audobon Society, KSU Rowing Association, Tuttle Creek State Park, Sunset Zoo, Pathfinder and Divers Down.

Each organization will have a booth displaying their sport or activity. The UPC Outdoor Recreation Committee will be displaying information on various trips that are planned for this fall. These trips are lake canoeing at Tuttle Creek Lake, a mini-rappelling trip at Tuttle Creek, and a rappelling trip in Missouri.

Big Eight coaches scared by NCAA decision

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bill McCartney says Big Eight coaches are "running scared" since 60 players were suspended at Nebraska for NCAA ticket policy violations, but not one Big Eight coach knows how his school stood when the measure was voted into law.

"I honestly don't know," Oklahoma State Coach Pat Jones said Monday.

"You'll have to ask our athletic director about that," said Iowa State's Jim Criner.

"In fact, I don't know," said Oklahoma's Barry Switzer. "You'll have to ask my faculty representative."

The legislation allowing only relatives or fellow students to use football players' game passes was drawn up and introduced at the 1985 NCAA convention by the scandal-plagued Southwest Conference.

The intent was to halt the practice of selling tickets for more than their face value, and Arkansas Athletic Director Frank Broyles was the first to urge that the convention adopt it. Needing a two-thirds majority for passage, it swept to victory virtually unopposed.

Now, however, the college bosses discover they have created an administrative Frankenstein. Nebraska, after turning over self-disclosure statements from players to NCAA investigators, was shocked to learn last week that 53 players would be suspended for one game and seven must sit out two games. The ruling was stayed pending an appeal from the NCAA Council's Sub-Committee on Eligibility.

Each November, the American Football Coaches Association prepares a list of pertinent legislation for discussion at the NCAA convention in January. The AFCA also mails copies of the official Convention Notice, outlining each convention proposal, to all head football coaches.

Nevertheless, every Big Eight head coach, including Tom Osborne of Nebraska, said in Monday's teleconference call with the media that they do not know how their school voted when the measure was brought before the 1985 convention. Several of the coaches also said they doubt the rule is enforceable and would like to see it changed.

"I think everybody is looking at it closely because we're all running scared," said Colorado's McCartney. "We don't want to have happen to us what happened to Nebraska. We're going over it and reviewing it with our kids and we think we've had a pretty good handle on it. But our people think Nebraska is as good as there is in the conference at monitoring tickets."

Criner was among those who are not sure the rule is enforceable.

"My own feeling is that...an athlete ought to be able to give a ticket to who he wants to," Criner said. "It's a great deal of hard work for people who are responsible for carrying it out."

Osborne noted that the schools, not the NCAA, voted in the rule.

"We're not upset with the enforcement people. They're just enforcing the rule," Osborne said. "They didn't make the rule. The representatives of all the schools made the rule. We're not mad at the NCAA. We think we've been put in a very difficult position, but it's not a quarrel with the enforcement of the eligibility committee. We just hope we can get a satisfactory hearing and get them to look at the broad picture."

K-State Coach Stan Parrish was at Marshall University when the rule was passed.

"I think it's going to be very difficult. We may have opened a can of worms with the thing," Parrish said. "But that's not for me to say. All I know is we're going to do our level best to make sure everything here is on the up and up until they've decided whether we have a good policy or not."

"It's difficult. It's a problem," Switzer said. "The logistics and mechanics are terrible. It probably needs to be changed. But it can be followed because we have followed it. We've followed it because I know we're going to be checked. I thought it was going to create some problems and it has."

Son's card collection entices father to start his own store

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

JUNCTION CITY — It's a baseball lover's dream, and it's only 16 miles away in old-fashioned Bartell Square Mall.

Most of the great stars from the past have homes there — Mantle, Berra and Mays for example. And the present and rising stars such as Ripken, Brett, Boggs or Mattingly can be found there, too.

For a quick fix while waiting for post-season action to begin, fans may visit the Baseball Card Shop owned and operated by Dick Martin of Abilene.

The business side of baseball cards — collecting, trading and selling cards — can no longer be considered just a child's hobby.

"Anymore it's getting to be a good-sized business," Martin said. "People still think of them as bubble-gum cards, but when you get cards that run up to several hundred, or several thousand, dollars apiece, it's a little more than that. It's an investment."

Baseball cards have been around since the early part of this century when cigarette and chewing tobacco companies started including cards with their products. Later, the more traditional versions were introduced when cards were packaged along with a stick of gum.

Martin, whose shop in Junction City has been open since July 1, became "reinterested" in the business when his son started collecting cards.

He said many parents are finding themselves in the same situation.

"What's happening is a lot of people were collectors way back when, and then those cards didn't really have any value. Now, their kids are coming in and getting interested in collecting and bringing their parents back into it," Martin said.

"They're finding out that the cards they messed with back then...some of them are worth several hundred dollars now," he added.

A card's value is basically determined by how a player performs during the various stages of his career, Martin said.

"For example, (New York Mets pitcher) Dwight Gooden's rookie card from 1985 is in the $8 to $9 dollar range. (New York Yankee first baseman Don) Mattingly's is up to $10 from 1984. It doesn't take a card very long to acquire value," Martin said.

A bad season can easily decrease the value of a player's card, as in the case of Kansas City Royals' pitcher Bret Saberhagen.

After Saberhagen pitched the Royals to a World Series title and earned the Cy Young Award last season, his rookie card value soared to $3. This season, one in which Saberhagen has struggled, the value has dropped to $2.

"And it may drop lower. For the moment, he's kind of sinking," Martin said.

The baseball card business is currently going through what Martin describes as "rookie card mania."

"Everybody wants the first-year card. It's even getting into where we've got in a few minor-league team sets because the demand is starting to come in for the 'pre-rookie cards,' so to speak."

"A minor-league Mattingly now brings $25 to $30 and the same with (Oakland A's slugger Jose) Canseco. When you buy a minor league set for around $3.95, if one player hits it big, it could be worth your investment."

According to Martin, the hottest card on demand and one of the hardest to find is of Bob Uecker, who only became famous doing beer commercials after his baseball career was over.

For those persons who wish to attain a substantial financial profile, perhaps investing in baseball cards is the road to monetary happiness, Martin said. It's also a way for a person to see an investment blossom without spending a considerable amount of money.

"Value-wise, if you're looking at it (the card) to buy and just strictly to make money, there's a lot of rookies and you're taking a chance," Martin said.

"But it's not a big chance," he added. "It's not costing you a lot."

Staff/Brett Hacker

Dick Martin, owner of the Baseball Card Shop, holds two of his rare cards, one from 1911 and the other of Mickey Mantle from the '50s. Martin's shop is located in Junction City in the old-fashioned Bartell Square Mall.

Former KC reserve Wathan picked to lead Omaha team

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — John Wathan, who moved to the coaching staff of the Kansas City Royals after ending his playing career in spring training, will manage their Triple A affiliate at Omaha next season.

His appointment was announced Tuesday in Omaha by Gus Cherry, owner of the farm club.

"I think he's going to be a very good manager," said John Scheurholz, Royals general manager. "He has the character, intelligence and work ethic that we look for."

Wathan said his many years as a utility player provided him with the opportunity to closely observe the game.

"As much as I've sat, I've always tried to analyze every situation," said Wathan. "I've always wanted to stay in uniform and eventually become a manager.

"This is a great opportunity for me and I am flattered they think enough of me to start me off in Triple-A," Wathan said. "Hopefully I can combine a little of the managers I've had along with a little of John Wathan."

Wathan played for Dick Howser, Jim Frey and Whitey Herzog in the major leagues and he spent four years playing for Billy Gardner during his minor league career.

Pitching coach Frank Funk served as interim manager of the Omaha Royals since June 26, when John Boles was named director of player development for the parent club.

Funk will remain at Omaha as pitching coach and Adrian Garrett, a former major league outfielder and catcher, will join the team as first-base coach.

Wathan, 36, was used primarily as a catcher by the Royals after coming up in 1976, but he also played first base and the outfield. He had a lifetime batting average of .262 and hit better than .300 three times, including .328 in 1977.

In 1982, his 36 stolen bases set a major league record for steals by a catcher.

Wathan has been the Royals' first-base coach since the All-Star break, when coach Mike Ferraro became interim manager because of Manager Dick Howser's surgery for a cancerous brain tumor.

New Chief's defensive end tackles career on silver screen

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — There's no question he's strong and up until now silent, but defensive end Pete Koch of the Kansas City Chiefs has finally opened up about his off-season role as a fledgling movie tough guy.

Koch, who had refused to talk to reporters during a training camp in which he won a starting job, has roles in two films due out in December. He appears with actors who are among the best-known of the tough guy genre — Clint Eastwood and Burt Reynolds.

In "Heat," starring Reynolds, Koch and Joe Klecko of the New York Jets play a couple of, well, heavies.

"We're both bodyguards for a bad guy," said Koch. "Reynolds plays a bodyguard-private detective guy, and we're bodyguards for someone he's after. We have a confrontation with Burt."

The movie with Eastwood is "Heartbreak Ridge," a war film.

"I play a Marine, an insubordinate troublemaker who turns out to be a good guy and becomes somewhat of a hero," Koch said. "Eastwood plays a gunnery sergeant, a lifer who is bitter about many things. The movie climaxes with the United States invading Grenada to rescue American medical school students held hostage by Cubans in 1983."

Koch said he had long conversations about football with Reynolds, who played the game at Florida State. He and Eastwood lifted weights together and Koch said he learned a lot about acting and movie-making from him.

For his own part, Koch said he clammed up during training camp so he could devote all his attention to winning the job vacated by Mike Bell, now serving a prison sentence on a cocaine conviction.

"The most important six weeks of my professional career was from July 24 until now, and it was important for me physically, mentally and emotionally to focus all my energies on football and maintain a low profile with the media," he said.

In Sunday's opener, a 24-14 victory over the Cincinnati Bengals, who drafted Koch in 1984 and released him last year, Koch made a good showing against Anthony Munoz, the All-Pro tackle.

Volleyball team puts on show worth seeing

TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Throughout the past few years, K-State sports fans have settled for any form of enjoyment possible. To be straightforward, there has been little to be excited about.

Until this season's football opener against Western Illinois, there has been little to cheer about at KSU Stadium.

Until Norris Coleman came along, the only exciting thing going on in Ahearn Field House in the last three years was the little kids who played basketball at halftime.

K-State fans have been starving for athletic entertainment and in the process have overlooked one of the most exciting sports in intercollegiate athletics.

On the wings of the television exposure received during the 1984 Los Angeles Summer Olympics, volleyball has been thrust to the forefront of college athletics.

For years, volleyball has been the rage on the coasts and in selected parts in between. K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson tells stories of his playing days at Ball State in Muncie, Ind., when there would be 7,000 screaming fans at a big match.

K-State's volleyball team had a few crowds last season that ran around a thousand and Nelson is hoping those people will bring back friends to see some matches this season.

Giving the K-State volleyball team a shot is well worth one's time. Volleyball has all of the ingredients it takes to be a bona fide spectator sport.

There are the dramatic spikes, the beautiful diving digs and the grace of an offensive play ran to perfection.

The K-State volleyball team has emerged as a powerhouse in the Midwest. Nelson has a young, powerful team that is very exciting to watch.

The Wildcats have two of the best outside hitters in the nation in Mary Kinsey and Shawnee Call, the most valuable player from last weekend's Pepsi/KSU Invitational. Kinsey and Call were two of 48 players selected to play in this summer's United State's Olympic Festival in Houston.

This weekend will give K-State sports fans an ideal chance to check out the Wildcat volleyball team when the 'Cats host the 10th Annual K-State Invitational.

Three matches are on tap for the Wildcats. At 3 p.m. Friday, K-State will face Drake, and later that night at 7:30, K-State and the University of Kansas will square off. At 3 p.m. Saturday, K-State will wrap up the weekend when it meets in-state rival Wichita State.

If you haven't seen a live collegiate volleyball match, this is a golden opportunity.

Nelson's young Wildcats are making strides, and for them to receive the support of the student body this weekend could have a positive impact on the squad.

I have no doubts there will be much more to cheer about this football and basketball season at K-State, but why pass up a chance for some fantastic entertainment?

If you can't make it out this weekend, never fear. There will be six more home dates when you can catch some action courtesy of the K-State volleyball team.

'Police' murder Chilean journalist

By The Associated Press

SANTIAGO, Chile — An editor of an opposition magazine banned under the new state of siege was killed after armed men who identified themselves as police took him from his home, the journalists' relatives said Tuesday.

Police, however, denied they had arrested Jose Carrasco, whose body was found Monday night outside a suburban Santiago cemetery. He had been shot in the head.

The authorities arrested dissidents and raided leftist strongholds after a Sunday night assassination attempt against President Augusto Pinochet. Pinochet escaped with only an injury to one hand, but five of his bodyguards were killed. His government declared a state of siege.

Gen. Pinochet attended the bodyguards' funeral Tuesday before heading to a rally staged in his honor.

Police reported they were holding 16 opposition activists and three French priests picked up under a nationwide state of siege decreed after Sunday's guerrilla ambush on Gen. Pinochet's motorcade.

Two escort cars destroyed in the rocket and grenade attack were put on display outside the presidential palace along Santiago's main boulevard, site of the pro-Pinochet rally.

Hundreds of uniformed and plainclothed policemen searched buildings in the downtown area and halted traffic two hours before the rally was to start.

Pinochet, who seized power in a military coup 13 years ago Thursday, scheduled the demonstration to support his candidacy for another eight years in office, starting in 1989.

Earlier, the 70-year-old army commander sat in uniform with members of his government and the diplomatic corps at a funeral Mass for the five police and army escorts killed in the ambush outside Santiago. Officials have blamed leftist guerrillas for the attack.

The U.S. charge d'affaires, George Jones, attended the Roman Catholic Mass. Government officials said a wide dragnet for the 12 to 15 would-be assassins had turned up no suspects.

However, the government announced it was holding 16 leftist leaders of political parties, university student associations, slum organizations and human rights groups.

The most prominent among the prisoners was Pascual Barraza, the Communist former minister of public works in the elected government of President Salvador Allende ousted by Pinochet.

Relatives of Carrasco, a former political exile who worked for the leftist news magazine Analisis, said he was taken from his home early Monday by gunmen claiming to be police.

Distance, commuting difficulties limit education for rural dwellers

By The Collegian Staff

Rural communities may offer a variety of advantages, from a quiet atmosphere to exciting conversations found at the local cafe. However, in the area of rural education for post-secondary students, the communities have not kept pace.

"Many of the adults (in these communities) would like the chance to either improve their skills or at least take a class that may benefit them," said Sue Maes, director of planning development for continuing education. "Some are in business, others are in nursing and some are teachers recertifying."

In many ways, the adult learners from rural communities share the same problems as the urban learner. They prefer courses relating to their life situations and need flexible scheduling. However, the distance and the commuting problems are a deciding factor in the pursuit of their education, Maes said.

"Financial aid does not consider the commuting expense of these students," Maes said.

Maes, along with representatives from the national steering committee, met Sunday through Tuesday at Airlie House in Virginia for the National Invitational Conference on Rural Adult Post-secondary Education.

The conference discussed various social and demographic changes in the rural scene, collaboration and cooperation in service delivery of rural education and various ways to finance that education.

The process has been ongoing since the first conference on rural education in 1981.

In the future, the University may become the site of a rural education center to reach those students in the outlying communities, depending on available financial resources.

The center will not take the place of on-campus education, Maes said, because there is much to be said for the interaction of students and faculty. But it will provide education for those who otherwise would not be able to get it.

They're wet and they're dry, Bruce Willis, co-star of television's "Moonlighting," tells us. They're another reason to hate California, the macho and somewhat negative Willis tells us.

They are wine coolers and, regardless of their aridity or emotion-producing potential, their washtub beginnings have generated jacuzzi profits.

It comes as no surprise that wine coolers are borne of the California beach. It seems Californians have a knack of turning even the most unlikely things — such as "jams" and Ronald Reagan — into national crazes.

And so it is with the wine cooler.

The inconspicuous beginnings of the wine cooler are as colorful as the product itself.

Picture this: It's the early 1970s and Michael Crete's task is to concoct a drink to satisfy the thirst of friends participating in a bump-til-they-drop volleyball game on the beach.

With a couple of plastic tubs, citrus juice and Chablis in tow, Crete comes up with what eventually will be called wine coolers. No doubt, over a decade ago their name wasn't as fancy, but Crete's friends guzzled them just the same.

And in his buddies' warm embrace of the cool drink, Crete recognized a larger — much larger — potential market for his product, thus, the creation of California Cooler Inc. nearly a decade later.

Crete and partner, Stuart Bewley, pooled $10,000 to launch the venture and in their first year, 1981, the company produced over 1,500 gallons of the coolers, valued at about $12,000. In 1984, sales of the spritzer hybrid soared to over 22 million gallons, valued at more than $72 million.

The creation and subsequent success of California Coolers Inc. prompted a bevy of imitators to launch their own coolers. Those coolers include Bartles and Jaymes, Sun Country Wine Coolers, Calvin Coolers and Seagram's. The wine cooler industry will have sales of more than $1 billion by the end of this year, as predicted in the Sept. 23, 1985, edition of New York magazine.

"It probably is the hottest food trend right now," said Carole A.Z. Harbers, associate professor in the Department of Food and Nutrition and instructor of a Trends in Food Products class every spring. "When they first came out, they thought it would be a fad — a passing trend — but it has been everything but."

The sales of wine coolers increased 380 percent from 1984 to 1985, Harbers said.

In Manhattan, liquor store owners and managers contacted agreed on the local success of wine coolers.

"They are very popular," said Nancy Bammes, owner of Bammes Liquor, 521 N. Third St. "People who don't appreciate beer but like to have something to drink like the small bottles in the four-pack," Bammes said. Her biggest sellers are Seagram's, Calvin Coolers and Bartles and Jaymes.

Joanna Powell, manager of Johnson's Liquor, 3256 Kimball Ave., said the wine coolers, at least right now, are a seasonal drink and have seasonal popularity.

"They (coolers) are very popular during the summer, but after fall hits, everybody turns to wine and liquor," she said. "Otherwise, they do real well during the summer."

Powell said the top three sellers at her store are Bartles and Jaymes, Seagram's and California Coolers.

At Beham's Retail Liquor, 1503 Yuma St., the owner's wife, Cheryl Beham, also said that coolers are a seasonal drink.

"This summer they were extremely popular," Beham said. "The top three that we sell are Bartles and Jaymes, Sun Country and Seagram's. Last winter they tapered off a lot, but they (manufacturers) did not advertise during the winter."

Beham said she is hopeful a new winter marketing campaign will keep coolers popular during the colder months. "Hopefully, that will really help," she said.

All three of the women in the local liquor industry agreed that the primary victim of the cooler's rising popularity has been wine.

"We've noted a kind of a slackening of regular wine (sales) and I think some of the beer drinkers are buying the coolers now," Bammes said. "It's taken a little bit of the trade from the wines."

"This summer they really did drop sales away from the jug wines a lot," Beham said.

Harbers said the wine market has grown.

"Wine is the only alcoholic beverage that has increased in sales, and that is primarily because of wine coolers," she said.

Wine coolers composed 15.8 percent of the total wine market in 1985, as compared with 6.2 percent in 1984, Harbers said.

The virtual overnight growth of the industry is attributed to two basic factors. First, wine coolers are different from any alcoholic product on the market. They are light, carbonated, fruity and sweet. Their appeal is to two significant groups of drinkers: those who drink wine and those who drink Perrier.

Second, the coolers have low alcoholic content, something many drinkers prefer today. Typically, coolers are about 6 percent alcoholic content. Harbers said there is a general trend away from hard liquor toward products with less alcoholic content.

"It's going along with this trend toward light," she said. "It's a combination of the fact that people want a less alcoholic beverage along with the fruit and carbonation."

S. Africa government hangs 3 activists

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Three black insurgents, including a 19-year-old convicted in a bombing that killed five whites, were hanged Tuesday after refusing to seek clemency.

U.S. civil rights leader Coretta Scott King, meanwhile, canceled a meeting with President P.W. Botha at the last minute. She announced her decision a day after leading anti-apartheid activists said they would not see her if she met with Botha.

The execution of the rebels, members of the outlawed African National Congress guerrilla group, caused little public outcry. Previous executions of ANC members prompted worldwide condemnation and appeals for clemency.

The three — Sibusiso Andrew Zondo, Simho Bridget Xulu and Clarence Lucky Payi — were hanged at Pretoria Central Prison at 7 a.m., said Supreme Court Registrar Martin van der Westhuizen.

He said three other convicted murderers also were executed. South Africa executes about 100 people a year, most of them convicted murderers.

The Sowetan, a Johannesburg newspaper for black readers, quoted relatives and defense attorneys as saying the condemned men did not want a last-minute appeal to delay the executions.

They were in good spirits and singing freedom songs on the eve of their executions, the lawyers were quoted as saying.

"They told us not to worry because they were dying for their own people," the Sowetan quoted one relative as saying.

Zondo's lawyer, Bheki Shezi, said his client's final message was that "the revolutionary loves his life but knows that life is not the end itself." Zondo was 19.

About 40 people turned out for a memorial service for the three in a Johannesburg chapel. The Rev. Sol Jacobs said Zondo, Xulu and Payi "have given their lives in the fight for freedom in our land. They died in the belief that they were working for the liberation of their neighbor."

Zondo was convicted in April in the Dec. 23 bombing at a shopping center south of Durban. Two women and three children were killed and 48 others wounded.

Zondo did not testify in his trial. The trial judge noted that Zondo had acknowledged to a magistrate that he planted the bomb but intended only to wound people.

Xulu and Payi were convicted last February in the May 1984 assassination of a former student leader who had turned against the African National Congress.

The United Democratic Front, the country's largest anti-apartheid coalition, said Monday that "going on with the hangings can only be seen as immoral and unjust."

Wefald seeks to fund faculty pay increase

By The Collegian Staff

University President Jon Wefald, speaking at Tuesday's Faculty Senate, emphasized the importance of increasing faculty pay to maintain a quality faculty.

"We want to get the highest faculty salary increase that we can get," Wefald said. "The No. 1 priority should be faculty salaries and then operating budgets and then program improvements.

"If faculty salaries don't go up, we're going to lose some of our best people."

In other business, senate discussed the progress of the proposed change in the policy on incompletes. Last April, senate recommended policy changes to limit the amount of student abuse of the policy.

If approved, the policy would require the student to complete any work for the class in which the incomplete was given by the end of the following semester, or the student would receive an "IX" on his transcript. The "IX" carries the points of an "F."

Senate member Al Davis, associate professor of family studies and human development, reported that the proposed change is now tied up in review by the Council of Deans.

"It's been a rather frustrating several months waiting to find out what the decision is on that," Davis said.

In senate's next meeting, the Academic Affairs Committee will discuss whether to delete Concepts of Physical Education (PE 101) as a common University core requirement for graduation.

Bennett

judge events effectively is by reading various historians and by exposure to their different points of view.

The importance of learning history is the process of learning how to think formal thoughts on given information, he said.

"And in the process of thinking things out, of weighing the facts and searching for the truth, he (the student) acquires a respect for facts and for the proper methods of weighing evidence," he said.

"In short, he acquires what is surely an important democratic skill — the ability to think seriously and critically about society and its affairs."

The teaching of history must not be reduced to "an accumulation of received truths, dead facts, and dry figures," Bennett said, but it must be a series of questions we put to the past — "history is for the heart," he said.

"History is a means of developing judgment and good sense; it is also an engaging human story," he said. "Students should know who said 'I am the State' and 'I have a dream.'"

Bennett's final argument for the importance of history was as a source of national and individual identity.

"History, in this view is nothing less than a source of personal identity, a means of acquiring a sense of 'connectedness' with a tradition, a community, a past," he said.

"It is a way of locating ourselves in time and space, of acquiring the values and ideals by which to live our lives, and of returning to the wellsprings of our being as a people and a nation," Bennett said.

To ignore history in this function, he said, threatens the ability of young people to overcome the trials of the future.

"I am not saying that American history is all sweetness and light — far from it," Bennett said. Certain ideals and aspirations are apparent though.

"The young must be taught these things, and at the same time they should learn that a large part of the world thinks and acts according to their principles," he said.

"They will cherish that truth."

saying Reed was kidnapped at 11:15 a.m. near the ruins of a supermarket in west Beirut's Bir Hassan district while driving from his west Beirut home to play golf at the city's outskirts.

Gunmen in a dark blue Volvo intercepted Reed's car a few hundred yards from the headquarters of Syrian intelligence officers supervising a security plan for west Beirut, police said.

An anonymous caller claiming to speak for Islamic Jihad, which means Islamic Holy War, claimed in a call to a Western news agency that Reed was a CIA spy and that "documents convicting him" were found on him.

An editor at the news agency said the call was in Lebanese-accented Arabic and that the caller hung up after reading a statement. The Christian-controlled Voice of Lebanon radio said the man promised to distribute Reed's photograph soon.

Islamic Jihad has cautioned repeatedly that any statement purporting to come from it without a hostage photograph would be false.

The group also claims it holds three French hostages.

great success.

"It is the clear responsibility (of government) to provide reliable information to the American people about the state of education," Bennett said. "The effort was to link what the research professor is doing with the practice in the classroom."

During the question-and-answer period that followed, Bennett answered specific questions about how school boards should set criteria to hire teachers. Bennett said competency tests could be used "if the test is the correct test."

"If you are going to use a test," he said, "you better be sure it's a good and sensible test."

Researchers link herbicide contact to type of cancer

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Kansas farmers now have more than low prices, high debts and the weather to worry about.

A recent study by the National Cancer Institute, in which a University professor participated, has linked the herbicides used in Kansas wheat and corn fields to an increased risk of cancer among the state's farmers.

An article published Sept. 5 in the Journal of the American Medical Association, said farmers exposed to herbicides more than 20 days a year in Kansas were six times — or 600 percent — more likely than non-farmers to develop a form of cancer called non-Hodgkin's lymphoma which attacks the lymph glands.

The above-normal rates are associated with the use of phenoxy herbicides, especially 2,4-dichlorophenoxyacetic acid, commonly known as 2,4-D. This is the most widely-used herbicide in Kansas.

"The herbicide is so popular because it has a low toxicity to humans," said Robert Robel, professor of biology and one of the head scientists in the study.

"There is no problem with human consumption," Robel said. "The herbicide breaks down rapidly under natural conditions. Two weeks to a month after being applied, you can't detect it out in the field."

The National Cancer Institute said it chose Kansas, which is the nation's largest wheat-growing state, as the site for the study because farmers use herbicides more than any other pesticide on wheat. Another reason cited was the fact that Kansas has a statewide cancer reporting system.

The study was conducted by researchers from the National Cancer Intitute, the University of Kansas and K-State.

The NCI scientists worked with scientists from KU, led by Dr. Frederick Holmes, and Robel from K-State.

The scientists studied 424 male residents who had been diagnosed between 1976-1982 with soft-tissue sarcoma, Hodgkin's disease and non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. The scientists investigated these cases because earlier studies had linked these types of cancer to herbicide exposure.

The scientists also studied 948 individuals from the general population who were used as control subjects.

The subjects or close relatives were asked detailed questions in telephone interviews about farming practices, including herbicide and insecticide use.

The scientists checked these findings by locating herbicide and insecticide suppliers to corroborate exposure information given in the interviews.

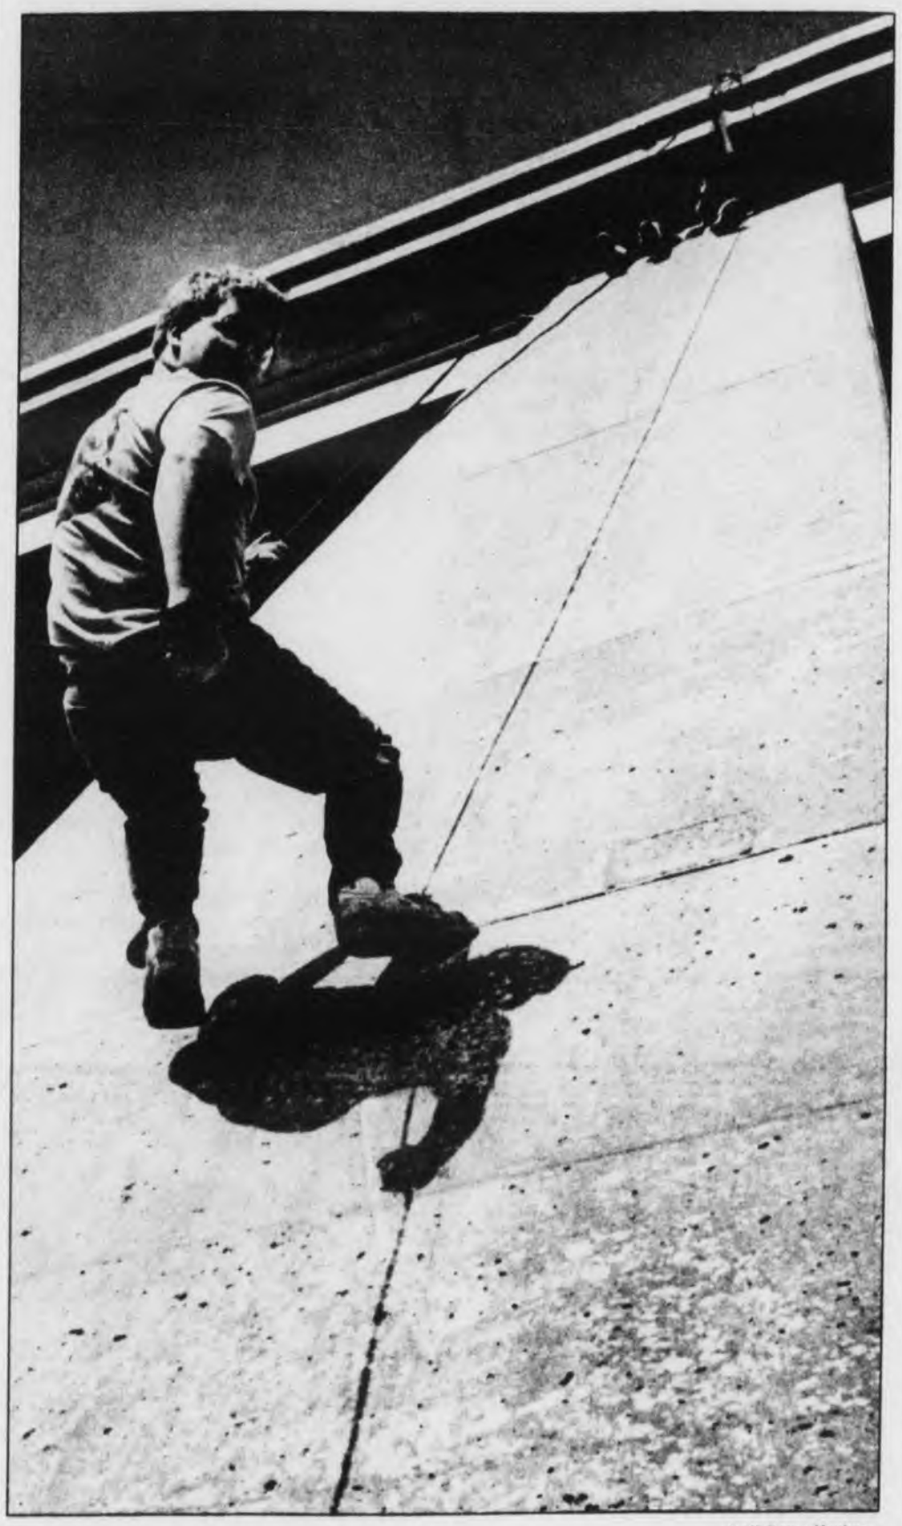
Robel compared this study to a recent study done in Sweden and said, "This study was more controlled. It will stand up well against scrutiny.

"Sweden's study was not as large or carried out over such a long duration," he said. "Ours is much more detailed. We checked records and corroborated all evidence.

"The manufacturers will probably attack it because the study gives evidence of problems. They will try to refute its validity."

The investigators found that, compared to non-farmers, the farmers had about equal risk of developing soft-tissue sarcoma and a slightly lower-than-expected risk of Hodgkin's disease.

However, because the scientists found an association between non-Hodgkin's lymphoma and the farmer's use of herbicides, the scientist investigated other causes for the above-normal rates.



They evaluated such factors as immune-altering conditions and drugs, the family history of cancer, cigarette smoking, coffee consumption and ionizing radiation. None of these factors changed the association between herbicides and non-Hodgkin's lymphoma.

The study showed that farmers who did not use protective equipment such as masks and gloves while using herbicides had a 40 percent higher risk of developing non-Hodgkin's lymphoma than those who took precautions.

Robel stressed the need for farmers to take precautions.

"They should wear protective clothing when applying the herbicide and wash these clothes separately," he said. "If they use the liquid form, they should wear waterproof gloves. If they use the vapor form, they

Gun range murder site hides clues

By The Associated Press

MARSHALL, Mo. — Investigators sought clues Wednesday in the slayings of a state conservation official and three other men at a remote firing range in west-central Missouri, their work hampered by scores of spent shells in the area and the fact that gunshots there draw little notice.

A Pettis County deputy sheriff, John Snyder, found the bodies about 4:15 p.m. Tuesday when he made a routine stop to check the Marshall Junction Wildlife Area, located about three miles southwest of the junction of Interstate 70 and U.S. 65, between Marshall and Sedalia. Officials estimated the victims had been dead for 30 minutes to two hours.

Authorities believe that two of the men who apparently went to the range to sight in their guns were robbed of a large amount of money and slain, while the conservation official and an associate were killed when they happened by after a visit to another wildlife area.

The victims were James Watson, 54, of Jefferson City, safety coordinator for the Missouri Department of Conservation; Chris Griffith, 38, of Columbia, a physical therapist who occasionally worked as a consultant with the department; Don Vanderlinden, 64, of Independence; and his brother-in-law, John Burford, 57, of Sedalia.

Saline County Coroner Bedford Knipschild said they had been shot at least twice at close range. Sgt. Jim Watson of the Missouri Highway Patrol said the four were shot with a .30-caliber weapon, but investigators said they did not know how many assailants were involved.

Their bodies were taken to Columbia, where autopsies were being performed Wednesday.

About 45 law enforcement officers gathered Wednesday morning at the Marshall Housing Authority for a briefing on the case before fanning out to press the investigation.

Lafayette County Sheriff Gene Darnell, a leader of the major case squad activated for the investigation, said it included members of the Missouri Highway Patrol, city police officers and deputies from 11 or 12 counties.

"We're just running down leads," he said.

Cadets win ROTC awards

By The Collegian Staff

The Army ROTC kicked off the new school year Wednesday at West Stadium by recognizing 26 cadets for their work in scholastics or ROTC class.

The Distinguished Military Student Award was given to 10 of the cadets. This award is given to military science cadets who attained a standing in the upper one-third of their ROTC class last spring or this summer, as determined by the Order of Merit.

Nine cadets were also given the Scholastic Excellence Award. This award was given to the cadets who finished with a semester grade point average of 3.5. Cadets who earned a 3.0 semester grade point average were awarded the KSU Scholastic Excellence Award.

A special award, the Meritorious Service Medal, signed by Secretary of the Army John O. Marsh Jr., was awarded to Sgt. Richard E. Thorp, senior in political science.

This award, which is the second highest service award, was earned for outstanding service while on his last tour of active duty.

Gunmen kidnap Lions Club leader of Lebanon, Jordan in west Beirut

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — The top official of the International Lions Club for Lebanon and Jordan was kidnapped Wednesday in Moslem west Beirut, one day after an American educator was abducted on his way to play golf.

Police said three men armed with silencer-equipped pistols and riding in a wine-colored BMW intercepted Lions Club governor Victor Kenou at 9:35 a.m. near the French Embassy compound on Rue Clemenceau.

Two of the assailants forced Kenou out of his white Mercedes-Benz at gunpoint and bundled him into their car, police said.

Kenou, 50, heads the 39 International Lions Clubs in Lebanon and Jordan. A Syrian-born Christian, Kenou is a naturalized Lebanese citizen who runs a prosperous import-export business in both the Moslem and Christian sectors of the Lebanese capital, according to police and family friends.

His wife, Rose, who lives in west Beirut, told The Associated Press by telephone, "Contacts are under way at the highest levels to win my husband's release. I am hopeful."

The Lions Clubs are among few social institutions still operating despite Lebanon's 11-year-old civil war.

Kenou's abduction, like the kidnapping of American educator Frank Herbert Reed on Tuesday, was an apparent challenge to Syria, which sent troops into west Beirut in July in an effort to restore order and end the deadly anarchy spawned by warring Moslem militias.

Police said they have no clues to either man's whereabouts.

Reed, 53, director of the Lebanese International School in west Beirut, was the first American kidnapped in Lebanon in 15 months. A school associate said Reed has lived in Lebanon about eight years and converted to Islam.

The kidnappers freed Reed's Lebanese driver a few hundred yards from the headquarters of Syrian intelligence officers in charge of west Beirut's security plan.

A telephone caller claiming to speak for Islamic Jihad, a Shiite Moslem group espousing the teachings of Iran's Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, claimed responsibility for Reed's abduction and charged he was a CIA spy.

Reagan receives reply on spy case

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan said Wednesday night he has received a reply from Soviet leader Michail Gorbachev to the U.S request for the early release of journalist Nicholas Daniloff, who is being held by the Soviets on spy charges.

But Reagan gave no details of Gorbachev's response, saying, "I don't want to rock the boat."

Reagan spoke briefly to reporters following a state dinner at the White House held in honor of Brazilian President Jose Sarney.

He also declined to predict when the issue might be resolved.

Reagan had asked Gorbachev for Daniloff's release on grounds that the U.S. News & World Report correspondent was not a spy.

While Reagan hesitated on retaliatory moves for the arrest of Nicholas Daniloff, the private sponsors of a high-profile meeting in the Soviet Union between U.S. and Soviet officials are likely to cancel next week's session unless a jailed American reporter is freed, the group's spokesman said Wednesday.

A spokesman for the Chautauqua Institution said "it's highly unlikely anyone is going to go if Daniloff remains in prison. That's a basic reality."

The spokesman, Tom Becker, said the administration, which provided a half-dozen U.S. officials for the meeting in the Latvian capital of Riga, and the Jamestown, N.Y., group itself are reluctant to cancel the meeting.

"I don't think anyone wants to lose this opportunity," Becker said.

Officials were to debate U.S. and Soviet policy at the meeting and their dialogues were to be shown on Soviet television.

A briefing for the U.S. delegation, which numbers about 270, was scheduled for late in the afternoon.

A decision by the administration had been expected Wednesday, but White House officials said it could be

House discusses proposed drug bill

WASHINGTON — The House began debate Wednesday on a multi-billion dollar drug bill, a day after House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. bluntly told President Reagan the effort will cost much more than the administration appears willing to spend.

"Drug traffickers beware, this Congress means business," Rep. Jimmy Quillen, R-Tenn., said.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Texas, admitted the bill "will not solve all of the problems" but said it would "permit us to make progress rather than losing ground."

O'Neill said that at a White House meeting Tuesday, attended by President Reagan, budget chief James Miller III said $250 million would be available for a new drug initiative.

The speaker said he later received a call from the White House, in which he was told the figure cited by Miller, director of the Office of Management and Budget, was too low.

Pakistanis may be linked to hijack

KARACHI, Pakistan — Four Palestinians held in the hijack of a Pan Am jumbo jet had detailed knowledge of the security system at Karachi airport, indicating they were assisted by Pakistanis, security officials said.

The death toll in Friday's hijacking, meanwhile, rose to 20 Wednesday after 18-year-old Imram Ali Rizvi of Pakistan died of his injuries. Rizvi had been lying brain-dead at a Karachi hopital. More than 100 people were injured.

Authorities are looking for Pakistanis who provided hijackers with weapons, uniforms and detailed information on Karachi airport and its security, said security officials who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"Without Pakistani help there was no question of carrying out this operation," said one official. "There had to be a Pakistani connection who guided them through everything."

The officials said they had little information on whether the hijackers were linked to a political group, but said there were signs they had Shiite Moslem connections.

Western diplomats in Islamabad, speaking on condition of anonymity, said, however, that all evidence so far pointed to the gunmen being linked to a Palestinian group.

Egypt, Israel open door to summit

CAIRO, Egypt — Egyptian and Israeli negotiators reached agreement Wednesday night on a formula for settling a lingering border dispute, opening the way for the two countries' first summit meeting in five years.

The agreement, after days of intense negotiations, needed final approval of the Egyptian Cabinet, which was considering it in a late-night emergency session.

David Kimche, co-chairman of the Israeli negotiators, said his government already had approved it.

Avraham Tamir, the other Israeli co-chairman, said, "The summit will take place as scheduled in Alexandria."

State asks Trailways to explain

TOPEKA — Trailways Lines Inc. Wednesday was ordered to submit a comprehensive explanation of why it wants to eliminate bus service to 56 Kansas communities by the Kansas Corporation Commission.

The commission also told the Dallas-based bus line it was consolidating the most request abandonment proposal with an earlier request to drop service to 10 Kansas cities on routes between Wichita and Lincoln, Neb.

All totaled, 38 of the 56 cities involved would be left without any bus service if the Trailways pullout is approved. The company wants to keep just one line — from Kansas City to Wichita via Lawrence, Topeka and Emporia which also serves Winfield and Arkansas City on its way to Oklahoma City, Okla.

Routes it proposes dropping include Topeka to Denver, Colo., Wichita to Lamar, Colo., Wichita to Joplin, Mo., and Kansas City to Pittsburg.

By consolidating the cases, the commission will have more time to consider the proposed abandonment — which Trailways wants to take effect on April 1, 1987. The commission will have 120 days to consider the request after the updated request is filing.

Debate to discuss liquor issue facts

BELOIT — A debate on the liquor-by-the-drink issue in Kansas Sunday will deal in facts, not opinions, says the chief opponent on the liquor issue.

"Opinions mean nothing, we'll deal in facts," the Rev. Richard Taylor said Tuesday of his debate with Gov. John Carlin scheduled at the Beloit Chautauqua.

"What I think has nothing to do with the issue. The facts will present themselves," said Taylor, president of the Topeka-based Kansans for Life at Its Best.

Carlin supports the issue that will be on the November ballot to allow local option votes on liquor by the drink. He has said he favors the issue because more open liquor laws will bring economic development to Kansas.

Actor returns for local celebration

HORTON — The city of Horton will be 100 years old Sept. 20 and the 2,010 residents of the northeast Kansas community can look forward to a whole week of activities.

Wiley Harker, 72, a television actor, has returned to his hometown in Brown County to help with the production of "The Musical History of Horton."

Harker was born and raised in Horton but left the town in 1931 and headed for Hollywood.

Harker has appeared on several television shows, including "General Hospital," "Dallas," "Little House on the Prairie," and most recently appeared in the TV movie "The First Monday in October."

Activities which begin Monday will include arts and crafts shows, street dances, as well as guided tours of many of the town's homes.

KPL safety program assists community

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

After a full year of KPL Gas Service's Safety Watch program, the program has been called a success, said John Johannes, Manhattan district manager.

Kansas Power and Light gas service employees have helped people in hundreds of incidents in the past year, he said.

They also have served as an "extra set of eyes and ears" for law enforcement and fire departments throughout the company's four-state service area, Johannes said.

More than 3,000 KPL Gas Service employees are in the field each working day, many in radio-equipped vehicles, and they have the ability to assist their fellow citizens. These employees have been trained in observing and reporting techniques as part of the Safety Watch program, which is coordinated with local public safety officials, he said.

"We, as individual employees and as a company, are a part of the communities in which we work and live," Johannes said. "Safety Watch is one of the ways we can be good neighbors."

Gas service employees have reported prowlers and house fires; helped in the search for missing children; called ambulances for accident victims; put out auto fires; helped disoriented elderly; sheltered victims of animal attacks; and assisted stranded motorists, Johannes said.

"Our new area manager, Carl Ricketts, in Junction City, was driving to work during the second week of August. He noticed a lady had fallen, so he stopped to render assistance," said Stacy Kohlmeier, public relations coordinator for the Manhattan district office.

"He radioed for an ambulance and she was taken to Geary County Hospital and was treated for a broken hip," she said. "We have also helped a number of stranded motorists this last year."

Johannes said a large portion of the Safety Watch program is geared toward children. Company vehicles have been made more easily recognizable for young children with the use of McGruff, nationally known as the dog that "takes a bite of crime."

All KPL Gas Service vehicles carry the designation "Safety Watch" and a decal showing "McGruff, the Crime Dog," along with the company's double-star logo, he said.

"McGruff has visited area schools, along with our customer advisers, and has participated in special events, such as parades, to tell children how they can get help when they need it through Safety Watch," Kohlmeier said.

The program has been recognized by the President's Citation Program for Private Sector Initiatives.

Farrell acts as government depository

By The Collegian Staff

Many students do not realize they have access to the most current information on a wide range of subjects in the Government Documents Department in Farrell Library.

The department, located on the third floor of the library, contains documents written by one of the world's largest publishers, the U.S. government.

Some of the department's most recent acquisitions include the report of the Attorney General's Commission on Pornography and reports from the Presidential Commission on the Space Shuttle Challenger Accident.

"Farrell is one out of 1,400 depository libraries in the country to receive these government documents," said Sandy Schrag, document librarian.

"After the government agencies publish these documents, they decide which reports would be of interest to the public and send them out to the depository libraries with no charge," she said.

The documents are sent to the library daily through the Library Programs Service, a division of the Government Printing Office.

Farrell receives about 2,000 government reports each month, Schrag said. Recently, the department has received more documents on microfiche, a photographic record on a reduced sheet of film. This film simplifies storage and access to information, Schrag said.

Although some of the reports are written for a professional audience, many of these can be easily understood by the average reader, she said.

The department houses decades of information for student use.

"We have a few documents dating back to the 1700s. The majority, however, are from the 1940s and on," Schrag said. Depending on content, many reports are received by Farrell within a month of publication.

"The students' biggest problem is they're unsure where to find these documents," Schrag said. Though the reports are not in the card catalogs, reference assistants can help students find materials during the library hours.

The department will have an October display in the lobby of Farrell to help commemorate the 125th anniversary of the Government Printing Office.

Democracy feasible, Pakistini leader says

By ANDY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

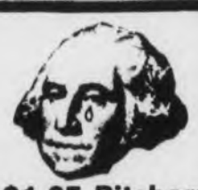
The people of Pakistan want one thing — free and fair elections, an opponent of the South-Asian country's military rule said Wednesday night.

"We have the ability and the desire for democracy. I believe we have the capability to change the government peacefully," said Rasul Palijo, an opposition leader with the Movement for the Restoration of Democracy in Pakistan, speaking before a group of about 50 people in the Union Big Eight Room.

Palijo said the military regime of President Mohammad Zia ul-Haq remains in power because of support from outside influences.

"But for the help these tyrants get from the United States and Western countries, we would be able to have a peaceful democracy," he said.

Zia came to power on July 5, 1977 by directing a military takeover of the government of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, elected in the first open balloting under civilian rule in Pakistan. Zia declared himself president in 1978.



"All that is done in the name of democracy is done under the power of one man. He will decide if I will be in jail for years, with or without a charge. He will decide if there needs to be a charge or not. He will decide if there needs to be a law or not," Palijo said.

Part of the problem with trying to transform the government into a democracy lies in information provided in the media which leads Westerners into thinking Eastern people cannot run their affairs, he said.

Palijo met with some opposition from Pakistani students attending the speech who said they believed a democracy might not be able to deal with the economic problems of the country. The students said the first democracy did not serve the country well and led to the failure of the economy.

"I know democracy is not perfect. In any case, democracy is better than military rule. These problems would have to be faced day to day," Palijo said.

Farmers should listen to pesticide warnings

In recent years, so many products have been proven potentially cancerous, many people say scientists will eventually prove "everything causes cancer."

The worst scenario occurs when people ignore warning labels. Scientists spend millions of dollars researching cancer believing people will heed warning labels.

A recent study of Kansas farmers found a link between use of a herbicide and non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, a form of cancer that attacks the body's lymph glands. The above-normal rates for cancer were associated with Kansas' most widely used herbicide, 2,4-dichlorophenoxyacetic acid, better known as 2,4-D.

Although a definite link to cancer was established by the study, use of this product will not decline in future years for two reasons.

First, because of its low toxicity to humans, 2,4-D has been a popular product. Because this herbicide breaks down rapidly under natural conditions, there is almost no trace of it in the field two weeks to a month after application, and thus it does not contaminate food.

Second, in the last few years farmers have used minimum tillage which requires more herbicides. If they decreased use of herbicides, they would have to cultivate more. Soil erosion and an increased amount of fuel usage would result.

Herbicides are here to stay. However, this is not all bad news. The study has shown risks of cancer decrease dramatically if precautions are taken.

For example, farmers who do not use protective equipment such as gloves and masks while using herbicides have a 40 percent higher risk of cancer. Farmers using spray equipment that exposes them to more chemicals have an 80 percent higher risk.

If farmers continue using these herbicides, they should heed the advice of the scientists who are working to help them. Robert Robel, professor of biology and one of the scientists in the study, says he is not worried about the results of the study if farmers take precautions.

Robel said farmers should wear protective clothes while working with the herbicides, wash these clothes separately, shower immediately after using the herbicides, use a safer granular form of the herbicide, and if possible, work in an enclosed tractor cab while in the field.

The labels and studies concerning products linked to cancer are more than just words. They represent much work toward a goal — the elimination of cancer. The public should heed their warning.

Republicans attempt to repeal 3-term limit

What was once a Republican idea is now haunting them.

The move in the late 1940s that led to passage of the 22nd Amendment in 1951 is now under the scrutiny of members of the Republican party. Guy Vander Jagt, chairman of the House Republican campaign committee, is leading the push to repeal the 22nd Amendment, which limits a president to two terms in office.

The idea behind repealing the amendment is to allow Ronald Reagan to run for a third term. However, it was after the third term of Franklin D. Roosevelt followed by Harry Truman's term in office that Republicans pushed through the 22nd Amendment.

If it was such a great idea to keep the Democrats from having a president in office more than two terms, why should it be different when the president is Republican?

In a Newsweek poll, 60 percent of those polled opposed the repeal of the 22nd Amendment, and 62 percent opposed President Reagan being elected to a third term. Despite the majority, a frightening number of people seem to be favoring not only the repeal of the amendment, but also Reagan being elected again.

The amendment prevents the possibility of a dynasty developing in the U.S. government. As long as it serves this vital purpose, it must not be repealed.

Letter

Bennett disappointing

Editor,

In attending the Landon Lecture on Public Issues Tuesday, I had hopes of hearing a positive new vision of education from Secretary of Education William Bennett. Instead I heard a shallow request for more history. Education majors are well aware that elementary history textbooks present a white male perspective based in an American nationalistic viewpoint. Surely the complex new world we live in deserves more than a step backward into the future with only one eye, a male perspective, to guide us.

I was also astonished that our secretary of education had not yet mastered the use of inclusive language. Surely he was aware that not all abolitionists were male. I would suggest that the work being done under the auspices of his own department would be helpful in broadening his vision and gaining help in the use of inclusive language.

This material helps affirm connections and dependencies (viewpoints often associated with females). After reading this material, I suspect the secretary would not be so quick to put the practical reality of our dependency on the land, such as teaching children where their food comes from, behind the teaching of subject areas that tend to differentiate, abstract and "transcend" reality (viewpoints often associated with males).

Secretary Bennett's call for more history will result in an increased emphasis on an already male-dominated curriculum. This curriculum has helped bring us to the brink of nuclear disaster. It has contributed to giving us the dubious benefits of overproduciton, overachievement and overkill. It has allowed us to arrogantly usurp the rights of women, other races, other species, and to poison and exploit our planet.

Let us begin to learn how autonomy is forged from within interdependence, and achievement from within nurturance. Let us begin to learn that within diversity lies our strength and in equity our freedom. These learning tasks are vital to our survival and I believe they cannot occur without learning to affirm characteristics that have been associated with women.

Job gives student new perspective

WAYNE LONG
Collegian Columnist

Undisputedly the most stressful, yet rewarding experience of my life was my summer job — working in a mental hospital.

My responsibilities included working with patients ages 12 to 80, each with their own specific illness including substance abuse, depression, schizophrenia, mental retardation, misbehavior or loneliness. I was also required to chart the daily activities of several patients. Charting is one of the ways a patient's progress is communicated to other staff members, and it fulfills legal responsibilites of the hospital.

A joke among the staff that took me a while to appreciate was a simple statement: "The only difference between patients and staff is that staff jingle when they walk," referring to the building keys staff members carry in their pockets.

It did not take long before I discovered not only this statement to be true, but also that I was a patient and the real patients in the hospital were my staff members.

Hence, in an attempt to describe how I changed during my three months of being a "patient," the following is how my chart might have looked. The word "patient" refers to me and my fellow staff members and the word "staff" refers to some of the patients.

Week one: Patient begins orientation by drinking eight cups of coffee on the first day and soon notices his stomach growls more often than before. Patient also notices other patients' stomachs growling and wonders if it is an ancient form of communication.

Patient is introduced to several staff members and finds it difficult to remember anyone's name, let alone start a conversation. Patient finds out many people he thought were staff members are actually patients by the jingle when they walk.

Week two: Patient begins to understand structure and professionalism of hospital. Patient begins to remember names and correlates this with drinking less coffee and getting used to less sleep.

Patient is amazed by communication and helpfulness of other patients and quickly learns there are no stupid questions in a mental hospital. Patient writes down quote from senior patient that states, "You can only do what you can; the rest you can't."

Week three: Patient finishes orientation and is introduced to hospital ward under close supervision. On the first day working with staff, a staff member tries to commit suicide. Patient has hard time understanding why someone's main goal in life is to end it. Patient does not sleep well at night.

The following day, patient is forced to physically move a staff member to his room for misbehavior. It is the first time patient has used physical force on anyone. Patient does not sleep well at night.

Week four: Patient is convinced by other patients that things will get better and is told several stories about other patients' first weeks working directly with staff. Patient is not optimistic and wonders why anyone would want to choose this profession for a career.

Weeks five through eight: Patient begins to feel more comfortable working with staff, not because staff becomes easier to work with, but because patient understands he is not responsible for staff's actions. Patient realizes that each staff member is an individual human being who deserves to be treated as such.

Patient begins to find it hard not to become friends with the majority of the staff members and is reminded by senior patient that the job is to help provide a therapeutic community, not become individual counselors. There are no saviours in a mental hospital; everyone must save himself.

Patient receives tremendous jolt when a non-verbal staff member tells him "good night" after tucking him into bed. Patient realizes that just because someone will not talk does not mean he cannot hear everything said. Patient realizes everyone, even the terribly unfortunate who cannot express it, have feelings of comfort, love and pain.

Last Day: Patient is given farewell party and is asked to tell about his experience working at hospital. Patient cannot find the words to describe people who have dedicated their lives to helping people. Patient no longer wonders why other patients choose this profession as a career; it is worth it, knowing you have played a part in someone's life. There are no patients and staff, only people helping people. Each jingles when he walks.

Patient, with tears in his eyes, is discharged to Kansas State University.

KSU Stadium needs alternate uses

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

Are you all fired up? For the football game Saturday night, that is. If you aren't just yet, I'm sure you will be after spending Friday and most of Saturday in quiet soul-searching preparation, that "special" kind of preparation that leaves your head feeling even emptier than usual and sends you crawling to the restrooms at halftime (if you are lucky enough to make it that far).

This Saturday's game against Northern Iowa will be played at night, which gives everyone the opportunity to view the game "under the lights" — those rather ridiculous-looking mega-expensive lights that rarely get used, surrounding the almost as rarely used football stadium. The KSU Stadium is host to five or six home games a year, and an occasional "let's drag those freshmen out of the bars (where they're devising new and exciting ways to rub off their handstamp and belly up to the bar) and out on the field, and have a really neato fun pep rally where we can all meet Willie the Wildcat and the K-State cheerleaders." Though getting within 10 feet of those pompons may be something to write home about for a few, the Aggieville Adventure still somehow manages to appeal to the vast majority.

Thus, the idea of putting on perhaps two or three more neato fun pep rallies a week in the stadium doesn't hold much promise. It's really such a nice place, though, with such nice big lights, so why not attempt to use it more often during the year? The possibilities are limitless, for example:

— A big tanning salon. Simply substitute infrared bulbs for the existing ones, turn on the lights, and look out. The place will be overrun by greeks in no time.

— The new K-State marching band practice grounds. Anyone who has ever lived on the east side of campus will surely appreciate that idea. Forgive the digression, but it's time to unload, lash out, whatever. Lately, the first few notes of "The Wabash Cannonball" have become incredibly monotonous, probably because it's been played for the seventh time that day and the 43rd time that week.

Back to the subject of moving the band over to the stadium permanently. What better way to teach band members how to march in formation while protecting the goalposts from trashed fans at the KU-K-State football game? After a few scrimmages with the football team, the band will become a big, mean marching machine in no time.

— A concert arena. The stadium has room for a big crowd, and its open-air seating arrangement makes for a great place to party, or rather, sit quietly and enjoy the show. How about booking Run DMC for the first date? Use the football players as security guards and we just might have a winning season yet.

— A parking lot. The stadium already has a pretty big one, so use that, plus utilize the football field itself for faculty/staff parking to give them the best places available. Traffic and Security could make a killing by ticketing cars not prominently displaying at least three or four "I'm a Stan fan" or "Eat 'em up, eat 'em up, KSU" bumper stickers. With that many potential parking spaces, and thus that many cars, the campus police would be in "writing-tickets-heaven-on-earth."

So there you have it. A few simple, yet marvelous ideas to keep that football stadium in use year-round and raise some money, too.

In the meantime, however, let's all cheer the Wildcats on Saturday night. Go K-State!

Farrell adds computer research services

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

Farrell Library has acquired two new computer services to make researching easier and more convenient.

The computer services will aid in information-gathering tasks, said Glenn Remelts, Farrell's on-line search supervisor. The services have been named EXPLORE! and DISCLOSURE.

EXPLORE! offers the same services as Farrell's AFTER DARK search service. Remelts said the major difference between the two services is that EXPLORE! allows the student instead of a library employee to do the actual computer search.

Remelts said many people who have used and evaluated AFTER DARK said they wanted to try to do their own searches.

"I imagine that most of the initial users of EXPLORE! will be faculty and graduate students," Remelts said. "It requires good judgment to use it. If people have computer fright, it's probably something they shouldn't use."

Users of EXPLORE! log into a central computer, which is located in New York. Remelts said this computer, operated by Bibliographical Retrieval Services, contains about 50 data bases, ranging from agriculture to business to social sciences.

Users may be on-line for no longer than 50 minutes, and the results of the search depend entirely on the user's computer skills. AFTER DARK uses this same computer.

In addition to the EXPLORE! and AFTER DARK search services, Farrell also offers a full service on-line search. This search is done by experienced searchers.

"We are one of the few libraries in the country that offers all three services," Remelts said. "We basically offer a service for every need and price range."

Remelts said EXPLORE!, located in Farrell 101, may be used from 7 p.m. to 9:30 p.m., Monday through Thursday. Charges range from $2 to $7 and must be paid in the form of AFTER DARK coupons or with an interdepartmental requisition form.

AFTER DARK coupons can be purchased at the circulation desk. Users must also sign up for time slots to use EXPLORE! at the circulation desk.

DISCLOSURE is Farrell's newest automated service. Remelts said its data base contains only business information.

Remelts said users of DISCLOSURE will find no articles or book titles listed.

"DISCLOSURE contains data on companies," Remelts said. "It lists statistics, such as net earnings, net losses, number of employees, etc."

Remelts said DISCLOSURE, located on the first floor of Farrell, will benefit people preparing for interviews, as well as students of business.

"Anyone having an interview can find out the basic structure of a company," Remelts said. "They will have a good idea of the statistical background of a business.

"Also, a lot of class assignments are made from the College of Business Administration that require students to know the type of information that DISCLOSURE provides."

DISCLOSURE's data base is on a compact disc, and the service was purchased for $3,000.

Farrell's Infotrac system, acquired in April on a trial basis, has become a permanent fixture in the library.

"We got the system on a trial basis for 60 days, and students fell in love with it," Remelts said. "Out of 200 or 300 evaluations, not even a dozen of them had negative comments."

Remelts said most of the negative comments were based on the narrowness of Infotrac's information content.

"Infotrac is geared to business, social sciences and general topics," Remelts said. "It's not a catch-all service. You are hard-pressed to find other topics, such as education or agriculture, in it."

Farrell will lease the four Infotrac terminals for five years at a cost of $16,000 per year. After five years, Farrell will only pay for subscription discs.

Award to aid ag freshmen

By The Collegian Staff

A scholarship for freshmen in agriculture has been established to honor Frank R. Carpenter, former dean and director of resident instruction for the College of Agriculture.

The Frank R. Carpenter Undergraduate Assistant Scholarship will help faculty in the agriculture college receive student assistance with teaching and research projects, and will financially aid freshmen in agriculture.

Recipients of the scholarship, who will be selected by the College of Agriculture Scholarship Committee, must have a high-school GPA of 3.5 or higher and an ACT score of at least 24.

David Mugler, associate dean of the College of Agriculture, said begining next year, one student will receive a scholarship of approximately $500. The number of recipients and the dollar amount may increase.

Business students gain new advising center, computers

By BECKY HOWARD
Collegian Reporter

Editor's note: This article is the fourth in a series on new administration.

As well as adding new faculty, the College of Business Administration has added new student facilities, Dean Randolph Pohlman said.

Change of 'State'

"The first new facility we've established is a new student advisement center, which we hope will be a showcase on campus for student advisement centers," he said. "It's a quiet, well-decorated, efficient facility with what we feel are first-rate advisers. It was just completed over the summer."

Pohlman said another addition to the business college is a new computing lab with 70 new microcomputers available for use by business students. Jeanette Harold, a former math teacher at Manhattan High School and computer programmer with Texas Instruments, was hired to run the computing center.

"Right across the hall from the computing lab is a new student lounge/reading room. It's really convenient because students who are working on the computers can take their printouts to the lounge, spread them out and look at them. Groups of students can even get together and compare computer printouts in the lounge," Pohlman said.

New faculty joining the college are Lynn Thomas, an associate professor of accounting from Texas A & M University; Cynthia Fraser, an associate professor of marketing from Ohio State University; Robert Brockhaus, who will serve as chairman of the L.L. McAnnich Entrepeneurship, from St. Louis University; Fred Rice, an instructor and director of the small business development center from the University of Vermont; Richard Ott, an assistant professor of accounting from Texas Tech University; Robert Hite, an associate professor of marketing from Colorado State University; and Sang-ook Kim, an assistant professor of management from the University of Nebraska.

All business faculty are currently discussing a new curriculum for the masters of business administration in the Department of Management.

"The faculty are considering making the MBA program more flexible by dividing the management program into three tracks. One track would be general business; the second, production; and the third would be a human resource management track," he said. "This is just in the discussion stages right now."

Pohlman said this new program still has to go through several advisement processes, including that of American Assembly of College Schools of Business. It will look at a tabled form of the program in December when they conduct a re-accreditation of the college.

Pohlman said overall the College of Business Administration, which is currently rated in the top 15 percent in the nation, is enthusiastic about its new faculty and programs.

Two-way system transfers courses from campuses to 37 areas in state

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

Unlike most classes where students interact in the same room, the University offers courses in which classmates can be more than 3,000 miles apart.

These classes operate through the use of TELENET, a two-way telephone communications system that allows verbal class participation without visual contact. TELENET courses have been offered at the University since 1970.

This semester, K-State, Fort Hays State University and Emporia State University are offering 15 TELENET courses for college credit from 37 locations throughout the state, said Jan Kruh, director of TELENET. These locations pay a monthly rate to receive this service.

Additional locations, where a sufficient number of students have enrolled, can be connected with TELENET through the use of TELEbridging, Kruh said. Such locations have to dial long-distance to gain access to TELENET.

Non-credit and credit classes with up to three hours of credit are offered to high school students and undergraduate and graduate students. The cost of the classes ranges from $47 to $75 per credit hour.

One class, Working in Space, is for high school students in honors science. About 40 students from Kansas and 10 from Delta Junction, Alaska, have enrolled. The science honors program has been offered to accelerated high school students for the past 12 years.

In addition, a science educators' symposium for high school teachers is being offered in conjunction with the class for the first time this year.

Two undergraduate college credits are offered to the students, while three graduate college credits are given to the science teachers.

Chris Hunt, a sophomore from Riley County High School, enrolled in Working in Space at the Manhattan TELENET location and expressed mixed emotions about the class.

"I'm interested in space and the college credit," he said. "It's different because I don't see who I'm talking to."

Dean Zollman, instructor of the course and professor of physics, said he likes the concept of the course.

"This is the only way for good science students around the country to get together and learn," he said.

Prominent physicists, astronomers and space science educators will lecture to the class via a TELEbridging hookup.

"This might be the only chance for these students to communicate with such respected research scientists," Zollman said.

Each TELENET location has a public address system and microphones allowing two-way communication between the teacher and students. Not only does the instructor hear the student, but students from other locations have the opportunity to learn and listen.

TELENET is convenient, saves money and allows a person to take a class at the nearest TELENET location without ever having to attend a class on campus, Kruh said.

Although enrollment is still continuing for the classes, Kruh estimates that about 900 students will be enrolled in the 15 TELENET courses.

Eclectic committee sponsors dance

By SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Reporter

An all-campus dance Friday kicks off activities planned by the Union Program Council Eclectic Entertainment Committee this semester. Great music, Selectrocution and a laser light show are promised, all for a $1 admission.

The All-Campus Dance will be open to all K-State students from 9 p.m. to midnight in the Union Catskeller.

The music will be provided by Russ Disberger, senior in finance, of the disc jockey service "Best Sound Around."

A wide assortment of music will be played at the dance, including songs dating back to the 1920s. Disberger has more than 500 albums and 1,500 singles. Most of the records are rock 'n' roll, but his collection also includes country, new wave and soul. Disberger encourages students to bring their own albums, just as long as they label them.

Disberger provided musical entertainment at Kickoff '86 Aug. 24 at KSU Stadium.

Also to be featured Friday is Selectrocution, a computerized message game.

"For a quarter, each participant will wear a number on their shirt and run a message on a video printout screen to a specific person that they would like to talk or get acqainted with," Disberger said.

Two 16-inch mirror balls, a bubble machine, fog lights, flash pots and a simulated laser light show will also add atmosphere to the excitement.

Eclectic Entertainment is one of nine committees on the Union Program Council. The committee consists of about 10 student volunteers.

HOW TO ENRICH YOUR EDUCATION BY $1,000 A MONTH.

If you're a math, engineering or physical sciences major, you could be earning $1,000 a month during your junior and senior years. That's $25,000 by graduation.

This excellent opportunity is part of the Navy Nuclear Propulsion Officer Candidate Program. It's one of the most prestigious ways of entering the nuclear field—and rewarding, too. You get a $4,000 bonus upon entrance into the program, and $2,000 more when you complete your Naval studies.

You also receive a year of paid graduate- level training that's the most comprehensive in the world. And you'll acquire expertise with state-of-the-art nuclear reactor and propulsion plant technology.

As a navy officer, you'll get responsibility and recognition early on. Your high-level experience and credentials will help make you a leader in one of the world's fastest growing industries.

In addition to the professional advan- tages, nuclear-trained officers get an unbeatable benefits package, travel opportunities, planned promotions, and a solid salary that can reach as much as $44,000 after five years.

Find out more about the Navy Nuclear Propulsion Officer Candidate Program, and make your education start paying off today.
